Ottawa UJA Walkathon raises almost $100,000

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The annual UJA Walkathon in Canada's capital has grown to a three-day festival, packed with activities for one and all.

This year's Aviv Jewish Festival sandwiched the Walkathon between a Saturday evening Yuk Yuk's comedy event May 24 and a Monday evening talk by author Naomi Ragen that attracted nearly 400 people.

According to Marty Davis, executive director of UJA, the Walkathon itself brought in close to $100,000, nearly double last year's total.

In spite of torrential rains on Saturday and an ominous sky Sunday morning, the weather co-operated and walkers, runners and rollerbladers participated with enthusiasm.

"After yesterday's weather, I had nightmares about today, so I am totally glad to welcome you all here today," said festival co-chair Ellen Fathi.

Mayor Bob Chiarelli, honorary co-chair of the festival, addressed the crowd. "We have a lot of festivals in Ottawa – Lebanese, Greek, and others – and we want to add to that the Aviv Festival, one that will attract people from across Ottawa and around the region," he said.

"What a day, what an event, what a community," said Chiarelli's honorary co-chair, Israeli Ambassador Haim Divon. "This very special community adds so much to Canada-Israel relations."

New this year, in response to the dire economic situation in Israel, was a "Shop Israel" tent with 30 tables of goods from the Jewish state. The sale continued on Monday at Agudath Israel Synagogue, allowing shoppers ample time to browse and buy.

Having only been in Ottawa for a couple of years, the former Montrealer said he wanted "to support the community and support Israel." His children enjoyed the jumbo slide and other activities following the walk.

Former Ottawa resident Ronda Stoller Wunsch was back in town from Toronto for the weekend with her family and wouldn't miss the festival. "I hate to go back to Toronto now," she said.

The largest single amount of $5,000 was raised by Cantor Daniel Benlolo of Congregation Beth Shalom West.

Organizers were extremely pleased by the participation and results.

"The festival is a growing thing," said Davis. "We had more food, more people, more events this year. Each year it gets bigger and better."

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Aging Holocaust survivors laid to rest an urn of ashes from the crematoria of Auschwitz last week in an emotional dedication ceremony of the memorial room of the soon-to-open museum in the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre (MHMC).

Among them was Aba Beer, who went to Poland almost 25 years ago to collect the remains from the death camp. Along with other survivors, he marched with the same urn through the streets of Montreal to the new MHMC in Cummings House. Seven of those survivors were back for the re-enactment.

In a solemn procession, the urn, which will remain on display under an eternal flame, was carried from the Gelber Conference Centre to the museum, off the main Cummings lobby, as Cantor Moshe Shur sang Ani Ma'amin, a song of faith often sung by camp inmates.

At the conclusion, the survivors spontaneously broke into the Partisans' Song, a scene watched by the 300 people watching on closed-circuit TV in the Gelber centre.

The survivors were given the first chance to see the new $5-million museum, which opens to the public June 30. The facility was created in consultation with a team of international museum experts and historians headed by curator Yitzhak Mais, former curator of Jerusalem's Yad Vashem.

There are 6,000 items and 3,000 hours of testimony in the MHMC's archives. They include 418 artifacts and 372 photos, almost entirely donated by survivors living in Montreal, as well as 18 films, both testimonies by local survivors and archival footage that are on permanent display over 5,000-square-feet on two floors. All texts and audio are bilingual.

The walls of the memorial room are engraved with the names of camps and ghettos on one side and, on the other, the names of the 5,000 towns Jews lived in before the war.

Mais said the MHMC is unusual among North American Holocaust museums in that the story of the Shoah is told in a personal way by the Jews who experienced it, rather than as a third-person account of what the Nazis did to them.

The museum, which will be officially inaugurated June 8 and open to the public June 30, expects 20,000 visitors in its first year, 80 per cent of them non-Jewish. September, October and November are already booked to near-capacity by schools, 40 per cent of which are francophone, said executive director Ann Ungar.

Most of the financial support came from those with no personal connection to the Holocaust. About 40 per cent was contributed by the three levels of government; the rest from corporations and individuals, including lead donor Jack Dym, incoming MHMC president and the child of survivors.

Big dailies agree on road map

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

On May 27, major Canadian dailies – including the Globe and Mail, the National Post and the Toronto Star – concurred in their lead editorials that the Israeli cabinet's approval of the "road map" was a very good thing. It is a rare occurrence for such disparate newspapers to agree on anything.

And, ironically, the Canadian newspapers were more upbeat about the prospects of Arab-Israeli peace than the Israeli media.

A veteran Israel-based Canadian journalist explained this paradox: The Canadian media reflect the aspirations of the Canadian government and of the West in general, which looks favourably on any moves toward peace in the region.

Israelis, on the other hand, while desperate for peace, understand that the road map has a slim chance of success because of the constraints Palestinian Authority (PA) President Yasser Arafat has placed on Mahmoud Abbas, the new PA prime minister. Their power struggle makes it very unlikely that Abbas will be able to clamp down on Hamas and Islamic Jihad, the essential first step mandated by the road map.

Israelis are also chastened by the bitter disappointment of Oslo, when Arafat spurned Israel's offer of statehood at Camp David in the summer and fall of 2000 and turned to violence instead.

Arafat appears determined to remain in control of the PA, in violation of the road map's requirement that it truly reform. Israelis believe that as long as he is in the picture, the conflict cannot be resolved.

Of the major dailies, the National Post came closest to aligning itself with Israel's point of view. In its editorial, "A flicker of hope," it opined that the road map "may have a fighting chance," but added that "it is hard to be optimistic."

Both the Star and the Globe were more positive, but not naive about what lies ahead. The Globe, for instance, noted that "any progress will be difficult, to be sure. Hamas, by its atrocities, has gained a virtual veto over the process, and Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas must crack down on those violent strains of Palestinian nationalism in order to help his people."

The Star said that while much is expected of Ariel Sharon, the first Israeli leader to formally accept the eventuality of a Palestinian state, "Abbas must first deliver the security Israelis rightly expect… He must not repeat Arafat's tragic mistake of spurning an offer of statehood. This war must end."

Israelis are hurting physically, emotionally and economically, and need the hope that the road map, at least in theory, offers them. Palestinians have suffered greatly too, because of the disastrous policies of their leadership, which has long exploited the purported victimization of their people instead of offering them tangible improvements and hope.

As the Star, Globe and National Post agree, this nightmarish game must come to an end once and for all. Unfortunately, as long as some western governments, including France, Germany and Greece, continue to meet with the figure who is the single greatest cause of the Israeli-Palestinian impasse, they only succeed in prolonging the misery of the Palestinians.

As the only Jewish facility in BC, the Dr. Irving and Phyliss Snider Campus for Jewish Seniors provides a continuum of care at the Harry and Jeanette Weinberg (of Baltimore) Residence (40 units Assisted Living and 20 Multilevel Care) and the Louis Brier Home and Hospital (217 Complex-Care). Exemplary standards of care and services are maintained within this blend of private and public sectors, fully accredited and affiliated with Vancouver Coastal Health.

Nestled in the heart of Vancouver, the Campus is fulfilling its mandate to serve the social, spiritual, and long term care needs of its predominantly Jewish residents. An exceptional opportunity now exists for the right person as . . .

CHIEF EXECUTIVE OFFICER

Reporting to the Board, the Chief Executive Officer will be a skilled strategic thinker and a recognized leader in long term care services, who has an abiding commitment to the care of others. This person must have a full appreciation of the Jewish faith, its culture, and heritage and will understand its central importance within the facility. An exceptional people-person, the Chief Executive Officer's superior interpersonal skills, and practical, well-organized management style will be entrusted to extend the strong bridges which exist between the Board, staff, residents and the community who truly constitute its "family".

The ideal candidate is a decisive, competent and energetic professional with the vision to guide the growth of this progressive organization into the future and one who will enhance its role in clinical services, education and research. While previous experience as a chief executive is preferred, as is an advanced degree, exceptional candidates now in search of a truly challenging opportunity to "move up" will receive serious consideration. Mount Sinai Run/Walk for June 22

Mount Sinai Hospital's Run/Walk for the Best Medicine, featuring a community run/walk for the Marvelle Koffler Breast Centre, is set for June 22, 9 a.m.

Presented by Scotiabank, as well as Running Room, Town Shoes and Echo Advertising, the run/walk will also benefit urgent priority programs at the hospital, such as the women's and infants' health program and the Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute.

The event starts and finishes at Queen's Park, and includes a 10 km run with a 5 km walk/run, live entertainment, a family fun festival, children's area, awards and prizes.

Cindy Berk, director of community giving at Mount Sinai says the walk is intended to be a "fun day for the community after a stressful winter."

They anticipate 2,000 people will take part, she says, and hope to raise $200,000. Registration is $35 per person, or free if $100 or more is raised in pledges. Children under 12 are free, and children who raise $50 or more in pledges receive a T-shirt.

Register online at www.mtsinai.on.ca/msh_run_walk; in person at the Running Room at Commerce Court on June 19 and 20, noon to 7 p.m.; or on run day, starting 7:30 a.m. at the registration tent at Queen's Park.

"שלום גידי. נעים תמיד לקרוא את מדורך. האמת שזה הדבר הראשון שאני עושה. אני ממליצה על ספר מדהים שקראתי בחופשת הפסח מסדרת "מרקי עוף", והפעם זה מיועד לנשמה היהודית,"Chicken Soup for the Jewish Soul". מצאתי סיפורים קצרים עוצרי נשימה. מה זה מומלץ-זה לא מילה". ליליאן בן לולו.

Father, daughter share stage at awards evening

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — This year's annual Jewish Federation Kavod evening, on May 28, was a proud moment for Justice Guy Kroft and his family.

The Manitoba Court of Appeal judge received the Sol Kanee Distinguished Service Medal for his contributions to the community and shared centre stage with his daughter, Sarah Kroft Morry, who received the Harry Silverberg Leadership Development Award, one of two young leadership awards the federation gives out every year.

"I am pleased and proud to have been given the Sol Kanee Medal, although I am not sure why I was chosen," Kroft said. "I am more proud of my daughter."

Sarah is the third of Guy and Hester Kroft's four children to receive a young leadership award.

"For a father who loves his children and has encouraged them to be involved in community, this is a nice position to be in," Kroft said.

The Sol Kanee Medal is given for outstanding dedicated leadership and service to the Jewish community.

Kroft practised law for 20 years before being appointed to the Court of Queen's bench in 1979. In 1993, he was appointed to the Court of Appeal and he is also a deputy judge for the Yukon, where he is required to visit once a year.

> 'For a father who loves his children and has encouraged them to be involved in community, this is a nice position to be in'

In the community, Kroft is currently the president of the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba. He has served as president of the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council, as vice-president of Canadian Jewish Congress and as a member of the board of governors of the Canada Israel Foundation for Academic Exchange. He is a former vice-president of the Canadian Council of Jewish Federations and was one of the founders of the Canada-Israel Committee, which was established after the Six Day War in 1967.

Kroft is also a member of the board of directors of the Winnipeg Foundation, one of the largest such foundations in Canada. He is a past president of the Canadian Red Cross national council and the Canadian Club of Winnipeg.

Sarah Morry, mother of three young sons, said her parents raised her and her siblings to care about the community.

"I grew up in a home where community involvement was the norm," she said. "I am proud and honoured to be receiving the Harry Silverberg Leadership Development Award, but I don't feel I have really done anything to deserve it. I have done a lot of community work, but it doesn't seem like a lot."

Her resume includes a term on the board of the Jewish Child and Family Service and the Jewish Federation and four years as co-chair of the CJA's Super Sunday campaign (which has evolved into Super Week). She is currently the co-chair of one of the CJA's Women's Division categories.

Rabb currently chairs the Asper Jewish Community Campus Enhancement Capital Campaign, is president of the mainly Jewish Glendale Golf and Country Club and serves as a member of the board of the Rady Jewish Community Centre, the Winnipeg Jewish Theatre and the Jewish National Fund. He is als on the Y Sports Dinner committee.

As chair of the annual Dr. Goodbear Golf Classic for the last seven years, he has generated more than $100,000 for the Children's Hospital Foundation.

Sharon Wolchock was the recipient of the Max and Mollie Shore Memorial Award, the Winnipeg Jewish Federation's other major award.

Wolchock is a former president of the National Council of Jewish Women of Canada, chair of the CJA Women's Campaign in 1999-2000 and 2000-01. She currently chairs the Partnership 2000 program that links Winnipeg's Jewish community with Jewish communities in northern Israel.

"Winnipeg's Jewish community is very special," Wolchoch said.

"I don't see this as a personal award, but rather a reflection of a community that values and nurtures people and allows someone like me to rise to a position of leadership. This award is a tribute to this community. I am not sure I would have been able to accomplish in other communities what I have accomplished here."

Dairy treats for Shavuot

By NORENE GILLETZ

Shavuot, which begins at sundown on Thursday, June 5, is a two-day festival that celebrates the giving of the Ten Commandments on Mount Sinai. The Bible describes Shavuot as an agricultural festival, a feast of the summer wheat harvest and the the first fruits. This was the start of the agricultural cycle that ends with Sukkot, the final harvest of the year.

On Shavuot, we decorate our homes with flowers, plants and fruits. Traditional dairy dishes include tender cheese blintzes, plump kreplach and crispy knishes topped with sour cream and fruit, creamy cheesecakes and cheese-filled noodle kugels. Mediterranean Jews celebrate by eating bourekas (turnovers) stuffed with feta cheese or spinach and cheese fillings.

I found a superb selection of dairy dishes that are perfect to serve on Shavuot in The Hadassah Jewish Holiday Cookbook: Traditional Recipes from Contemporary Kosher Kitchens (Hugh Lauter Levin Associates, $29.95 U.S., $49.50 Cdn.). This book was edited by Joan Michel, the senior editor of Hadassah Magazine. She is the author of several cookbooks, including The Foods of Israel Today, Good Enough to Eat and The Woman's Day Cookbook.

Based on the Jewish festival calendar, the book is divided seasonally. It begins with Shabbat and works through the traditional Jewish festivals, from Rosh Hashanah in the autumn to Shavuot in the spring. There are introductions and personal reflections from several well known Jewish authors, including Joan Nathan, Claudia Roden and Steven Raichlin.

The Hadassah Jewish Holiday Cookbook contains 250 of the best Kosher recipes, with wonderful family heirloom recipes submitted by Hadassah members from throughout the U.S. and Israel. You'll find the usual traditional classics, plus many modern variations, including a wide range of Ashkenazi and Sephardi dishes for the major Jewish festivals. This large-format cookbook, which took two years to compile, contains fabulous photos that look good enough to eat.

This book deserves a place on the cookbook shelf in every Jewish kitchen. It makes a great gift for new brides as well as seasoned cooks and is a perfect gift from mothers to their daughters, or vice versa. You'll find ideas for an abundance of holiday feasts to carry you throughout the year.

Enjoy the new tastes of tradition in this super selection of dairy recipes. I wish you and your families a 'dairy good' Shavuot!

CHEESE BOUREKAS

1 lb. feta cheese
4 eggs
1 tsp. salt, or to taste
oil for brushing

Defrost phyllo sheets according to package directions. Put between 2 pieces of wax paper and cover with a lightly dampened towel. Preheat oven to 425.

Crumble feta into small pieces and blend well with pressed cheese, eggs and salt. Remove 2 phyllo sheets at a time, keeping remainder covered. Place on a flat surface and brush very lightly with oil. With narrow end facing you, cut lengthwise into 3 strips. Fold each in half lengthwise and brush lightly with oil again.

Put 1 tbsp. cheese mixture on bottom right-hand corner of strip. Fold over to left side in a triangular shape and continue folding right to left, left to right, as if folding a flag. Lightly oil top of finished triangle and put on baking sheet. Repeat with remaining phyllo and cheese mixture. Bake 20 to 25 minutes, or until golden. Serve warm. Serves about 18.

Tips:

To vary this recipe, a 10-ounce box of frozen chopped spinach, thawed and squeezed dry, may be added to the cheese mixture.

Alternately, generously oil a 13 x 9-inch pan. Line with half the phyllo sheets, each oiled lightly. Spread cheese mixture over and top with remaining pastry sheets, each oiled lightly. Bake at 375, 30 to 40 minutes, or until golden; cut into 3-inch diamonds. Best when served warm.

CHEESE BLINTZ LOAF

Filling:
2 (8-oz.) packages cream cheese, softened
1 lb. farmer cheese
2 eggs, lightly beaten
pinch of salt
4 tbsp. sugar
1 tbsp. fresh lemon juice

Batter:
½ cup (1 stick) unsalted butter, softened
¼ cup sugar
2 eggs, lightly beaten
¾ cup milk

1¼ cups all-purpose flour
1 tsp. baking powder
pinch of salt

Preheat oven to 350. Grease 9 x 5-inch loaf pan. Mix all filling ingredients and set aside.

Make batter: Cream butter with sugar, then add eggs, milk, flour, baking powder and salt. Pour half of batter into prepared pan. Spread filling over batter and cover with remaining batter. Bake 45 minutes. Serves 6.

Cabinet decries portrayal of 'poverty-stricken Israel'

By AMIRAM BARKAT
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The government Sunday took the highly unusual move of condemning voluntary organizations that raise money for Israeli citizens from Jews in the Diaspora.

In the cabinet's weekly meeting in Jerusalem, it issued a statement saying the government takes a "very grim view" of the activities of "voluntary organizations" that use "images of poverty and hunger" to raise money for Israel.

While the announcement did not mention any organization by name, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon displayed a fundraising brochure published by the American Joint Distribution Committee (JDC). A spokesman for the JDC later said the brochure in question relates only to the security threats facing Israel, and does not contain any photographs of hungry Israelis.

A cabinet communiqué stated that "the phenomenon of voluntary organizations in Israel and abroad approaching Jews in the Diaspora [for contributions], while showing images of poverty and hunger in Israel, harms Israel's national strength and damages the country in the perception of Jews overseas."

But in order to avoid damaging the organizations' other endeavours the communiqué also expressed the government's "deep appreciation" of the assistance the Diaspora provides Israel.

The wording of the announcement was brought to the cabinet by the prime minister himself, who dedicated the meeting's opening session to a lengthy discussion of the issue. The move apparently follows Jewish Agency chair Salai Meridor's recent approach to Sharon, in which Meridor claimed that the past several months have seen a concerted fundraising campaign based on the portrayal of Israel as a poverty-stricken country.

In an interview with Ha'aretz, Meridor said the specific organization whose activity he objected to was the "Hunger Forum," one of a series of groups that try to raise funds on the Internet, using such methods as offering to "adopt" an Israeli child for 50 cents a month.

The "Hunger Forum," which is now known as the "Forum for Improving Nutritional Security and the Advancement of the Poor," was founded in January 2002 with the support of the JDC.

The group is made up of large philanthropic organizations and donors, most in the United States, but some based in Israel. The forum plans to hold a seminar in Jerusalem at the end of the month to discuss the results of a survey commissioned by the group and to plan its future course of action.

According to Meridor, the seminar is part of an ongoing campaign to include the issue of poverty in the official fundraising efforts of the American Jewish community. He said the trend heralds the "bankruptcy" of Zionism.

"Portraying Israel as a 'welfare case' offends Jewish sensibilities and creates a disincentive to those who may have been thinking about coming to live here," he said.

But Laurie Heller, co-chair of the Hunger Forum, said the organization "never argued that Israel is a welfare case. The government is cutting from welfare budgets and we believe that Jews everywhere are obligated to become involved. As Jews, this is our responsibility to our brethren."

Auschwitz visit may strengthen ties

By GIL SEDAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

OSWIECIM, Poland — Along the rails leading to the Birkenau death camp walked some 450 Arabs and Jews from Israel and France, silent but for the list of names they were reading..

The names belonged to relatives of Jewish members of the delegation, relatives who had been murdered during the Holocaust.

Last Wednesday's march was the climax of a trip that constituted an unusual show of Arab identification with the Jews' Holocaust burden, a show of support that – at least for the two days of the trip – wiped away political differences between the two communities.

The delegation to Auschwitz was the brainchild of Archimandrite Emile Shoufani, a Greek Catholic priest from Nazareth. Along with other Arab public figures, he sought a way to mend relations with Jews following the October 2000 Israeli Arab riots and the deterioration of relations between Jews and Arabs since the Palestinian intifadah began.

"We must pull ourselves out of the chapter in which everything in the relations between the two peoples is measured on the basis of giving in exchange for giving, killing in exchange for killing," Shoufani told JTA. "We are a group of citizens with no political aspirations, who are determined to restore relations with the Jewish people."

Though he stressed the need to stay away from politics, Shoufani said he hoped politicians would use the momentum to create a better atmosphere between Jews and Arabs.

The group included Arye Amit, former commander of the Jerusalem police, and Dedi Zucker, a former legislator from the Meretz party.

Eliezer Ya'ari, executive director of the New Israel Fund and a member of the delegation, said his organization was looking for ways to make use of the new development. "I will suggest that this group" –made up of teachers, clergymen and community leaders – "take upon itself the task of fighting racism and incitement," he said.

On Wednesday, a day after a moving ceremony at Auschwitz, the delegation moved through the death camp.

One of the more moving moments came when Ruth Lavie of Beit Shearim pulled out a picture she had drawn of a house and a tree when she was a six-year-old hiding in Amsterdam.

She had sent the drawing to her father, who had been sent on a transport to Auschwitz. The drawing never arrived; it was returned to Ruth shortly after she sent it, and she kept it for almost 60 years.

On Wednesday, she put the drawing in a crack in a stone in one of the barracks, along with a letter that read: "My beloved father Dov Jourgran, inmate No. 100896, murdered at the age of 42 on 11/10/43 after eight months of hard labour. This drawing has never reached you, and now I am leaving it here at this damned place, in your memory and the memory of mother Leah who was murdered in Sobibor. I still miss you and I shall never forget you."

French Jews debate whether community has future

By PHILIP CARMEL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

PARIS — A short distance from where French Jews gathered to debate the community's future lay the latest reminder of just how precarious that future is.

Participants entering the main synagogue in Creteil, a southern Paris suburb with a large Jewish population, were greeted with news that has become all too familiar since the Palestinian intifadah began in September 2000.

At around 10 o'clock the previous night, a large Jewish grocery store literally a stone's throw from the shul was gutted by an arson attack that police and community leaders believe was motivated by anti-Semitism.

The same evening, in the northeastern Parisian suburb of Rosny, swastikas were sprayed on the walls of the town's synagogue, along with slogans reading "Death to the Jews."

According to Sammy Ghozlan, founder of the Bureau for Vigilance Against Anti-Semitism and head of the Council of Jewish Communities for the region that includes Rosny, there have been more than 250 anti-Semitic incidents in France so far in 2003, and more than 2,000 since the intifadah began.

The Creteil conference, titled "The Future of the Jewish Community in France: Concerns, Questions and Perspectives," was organized jointly by the Paris-region Council of Jewish Communities and the Consistoire, an umbrella organization of French Jews.

Sponsored by the United Jewish Social Funds – the umbrella welfare and social organization of French Jewry – the Simon Wiesenthal Center and the European Jewish Congress, it brought together leading Jewish politicians, community leaders and intellectuals.

Presenting his statistics, Ghozlan said the community has been shocked not only by the level of anti-Semitism but also by the authorities' initial silence.

Moreover, he said, during the initial wave of attacks in 2000 and 2001, President Jacques Chirac and then-prime minister Lionel Jospin tried to minimize the problem.

Anti-racist groups marched alongside the Jewish community in the 1990s, after attacks by the extreme right and against right-wing politician Jean-Marie Le Pen. But many abandoned the Jewish community this time around, Ghozlan said, though he singled out the group SOS Racisme for its continued support.

One of SOS Racisme's founders, Julien Drai, said the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is being used as a pretext.

After the initial surge, anti-Semitic incidents dropped but they rose again at the start of 2002, Drai said. They culminated in April 2002, when a shul in the suburbs of Lyon was seriously damaged by a firebomb during Israel's incursion into Jenin.

It's worrisome that Jews in France even have to ask "whether we will still be here in 10 years time," Drai, a Jewish legislator in parliament and a Socialist Party spokesperson, said.

For Drai, who said he believes Jews have a future in France, the answer lies in the Jewish community's continued commitment to France's secular values and a willingness to demand that politicians take anti-Semitism seriously.

He added that the Socialist Party's reaction during recent protests against the U.S.-led war in Iraq were positive, with a firm directive given to members to leave anti-war demonstrations at the first whiff of anti-Semitism.

Some left-wing groups were not so scrupulous about anti-Semitism, he said.

"When they explain it away they justify it, and when they justify they legitimize," Drai said.

"Where are the teachers' unions to denounce school anti-Semitism?" asked Serge Cwajgenbaum, secretary-general of the European Jewish Congress.

Shimon Samuels, international director of the Simon Wiesenthal Center, said the growth in anti-Semitic attacks is a problem across Europe.

He detailed the rise in European anti-Semitism, particularly attacks emanating from the anti-globalization movement since the UN's anti-racism conference in Durban, South Africa, in September 2001 became a showcase for anti-Semitic and anti-Israel sentiment.

But while institutions like the Wiesenthal Center can provide statistics, Samuels said, governments must address the problem.

Another key conference speaker, Rabbi Gilles Bernheim said the situation of French Jews is symptomatic of a far greater malaise in French society.

Sections of French society are becoming alienated from the state and rejecting its institutions, said Rabbi Bernheim, who heads the Torah and society department of the Consistoire.

"When France ceases to love itself, that is bad for the Jews," he said.

Most new immigrant soldiers not Jewish

By AMIRAM BARKAT
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Most of the new immigrants who joined the Israel Defence Forces over the past year are not registered as Jews, Chief Education Officer Elazar Stern said last week at a conference in Heichal Shlomo, headquarters of the Chief Rabbinate.

"Last year, 51 per cent of the immigrants who joined the IDF were not registered as Jews," Stern said, adding that some 8,000 non-Jewish soldiers are serving in the IDF.

Until now the number of non-Jewish soldiers was estimated at about 6,500. Some 20 per cent of IDF soldiers are new immigrants.

Stern said a military base in the north recently requested 600 copies of the Christian Bible for swearing in new recruits. The Chief Military Rabbinate, which is in charge of religious services, supplied the books.

Stern urged the Chief Rabbinate and rabbinical courts to facilitate the conversion procedures of immigrants from the former Soviet Union.

Rabbi Simha Meron, former director of rabbinical courts, said the problem is not the conversion procedures but that the immigrants do not want to convert.

The number of non-Jewish immigrants in Israel is estimated at between 250,000 to 300,000.

Russia concerned over Israel's nuclear weapons program

By Aluf Benn
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEV AVIV — Russia recently expressed concern over Israel's nuclear program and demanded that this be placed on the agenda of international organizations concerned with preventing nuclear proliferation.

Speaking at a meeting of the Nuclear Suppliers Group in Pusan, South Korea two weeks ago, the Russians presented a report on the nuclear weapons allegedly in Israel's possession and demanded that this matter be addressed.

Experts say Russia raised the issue in an attempt to rebuff American pressure to stop its own nuclear dealings with Iran. The Russian claim is that Israel represents a greater nuclear threat to the Middle East than does Iran.

The Nuclear Suppliers Group, which is made up of 40 industrialized nations, works to prevent the leakage of nuclear technology to states suspected of trying to develop nuclear arms.

Its rules also limit trade in dual-use technologies, which can be used for either civilian or military purposes.

Israel, which is not a signatory to the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty (NPT), has been subjected to these restrictions for years. As a result, there is a long list of products that Israel has trouble purchasing on international markets.

John Bolton, America's undersecretary of state for arms control and international security affairs, will visit Israel next week to discuss America's efforts to halt Iran's nuclear program.

Shortly thereafter, the International Atomic Energy Agency's board is slated to meet to discuss the suspicions that Iran is violating the nuclear non-proliferation treaty by trying to develop nuclear weapons.

Personal reflections on meeting the Pope

By KEITH LANDY

In 1862, Moses Hess, the author, socialist and forerunner of the Zionist movement, published his book Rome and Jerusalem. This would make an apt title for an account of my recent visit, only with the directions reversed.

Leaving Jerusalem after a bittersweet 10 days of inspiration, sadness and hope, I flew to Rome where, in my capacity as national president of Canadian Jewish Congress and North American vice-president of the World Jewish Congress, I was to be part of a delegation scheduled to meet with Pope John Paul II.

WJC President Edgar Bronfman and Israel Singer, president of the International Jewish Committee for Interreligious Consultation, led the 15-person contingent. Picked up in front of the hotel, our convoy, just like in those foreign movies, went speeding through the streets of Rome, sirens blaring and blue lights flashing, all the way to the Vatican. We entered through the Santa Anna Gate, manned by the Swiss Guards in their colourful uniforms.

The convoy wound its way through narrow alleyways until we arrived at a quadrangle where Father Hoffman, a papal secretary for Jewish-Christian affairs, came running across to welcome us and lead us into the Vatican.

I had been told that the importance of a delegation could be measured by how many rooms it passed through on the way to the inner sanctum. On that basis, we must have been very important. We traversed a seemingly endless number of rooms, each more ornate than the next. I admired tapestries and frescos that I had not seen previously as a tourist.

Upon reaching the antechamber, we were asked to wait by 2 crimson-clad cardinals with long sounding names and even longer titles.

The moment was near. Soon I would be meeting the head of an institution that, until the recent past, had caused our people untold suffering and pain. What would my father, a rabbi of blessed memory, have said, I wondered.

Then the door opened, and we entered. The room was warmer than the others, decorated with beautiful works of art and with a magnificent carpet covering the floor. Seated in the middle was the man whom we all have seen so many times before from afar – on the balcony in St. Peter's Square, on a stage waiving to tremendous throngs or riding in the "Pope-mobile." Standing behind the Pope's chair on each side, attentive to his every need, were two resplendently attired cardinals.

We were invited to approach, one at a time, to be announced. The Parkinson's disease that the Pope suffers from was evident. His usually warm and smiling face, as seen in pictures and on television, was drawn and tired-looking. It obviously took tremendous effort for him to be holding audiences that day, making our encounter all the more meaningful. As I took his hand, I told him I was from Toronto and his face lit up, undoubtedly in recollection of his visit last summer for World Youth Day.

At the meeting, we spoke of the good relations that have developed between the Catholic Church and the Jewish community in the last decades, and especially during his papacy. It is this Pope, after all, who has advanced Christian-Jewish relations more than any other, affirming the eternity of God's covenant with the Jewish people and establishing diplomatic relations with the State of Israel in recognition of its importance to us and the world at large.

We urged the Vatican to completely open its World War II archives so that historians studying the actions of Pope Pius XII in the Nazi-era have full access to these important wartime records.

We suggested that a strong denunciation of anti-Semitism in a papal homily would be a valuable contribution to the fight against this growing worldwide scourge. This, we hope, fell on the receptive ears of a Pope who has described the "Shoah... [as] an indelible stain on the history of the [20th] century" and declared that "the spoiled seeds of anti-Judaism and anti-Semitism must never again be allowed to take root in any human heart."

We described the joint work of Jewish and Catholic charities in Argentina working to provide relief for the poor in that crisis-stricken country, and we stressed the WJC's interest in expanding such co-operative initiatives.

I was particularly moved and touched by the humanity of the man. When I approached him to say farewell, I wished him a "refuah shlemah," even though such a recovery is unlikely.

As I departed past a waiting delegations of African and Filipino bishops and priests, I couldn't help but offer a small prayer for us all.

The 'truth' about the Holocaust, according to PA TV

By ITAMAR MARCUS

Palestinian Media Watch

In yet another case of odious Palestinian Authority Holocaust denial, Palestinian Authority TV last week week presented the following "truths" about World War II:

- The Nazis did not specifically plan the killing of Jews.
- If Hitler planned any extermination, it was of disabled Germans.
- The term "Holocaust" in its "human sense" refers to the experiences of the Palestinians and the Gypsies.
- The "Holocaust industry" is a financial scheme dreamed up by Zionist leaders that has generated billions of dollars in profits.

It is curious the PA chose last week to run the interview, as many of the same points appear in a Holocaust denial book written by PA Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas.

The following is a partial transcript of an interview on PA TV with Ismail Elbakawi, translator of the book The Fundamentalism of the Jews in Israel. Elbakawi was discussing a book called The Holocaust Industry and his statements were supported by the interviewer.

"[The Holocaust] was a real event that occurred from 1939 to 1945. However, it did not just affect the Jews in Europe, but also other nations including the Poles, the Hungarians, the Russians – as you remember, 20 million Russians were killed, and Germans, and Gypsies. They were annihilated and killed as a result of the war, and not due to a prior plan," Elbakawi said.

"It is possibly true that Hitler planned the extermination of disabled Germans. It is likely that these things are true, I don't know," he continued.

"This is the historical truth: the true Nazi Holocaust. I apologize for using the word 'Holocaust.' This is a word that they try to attach only to the Jews who were killed, but I use this expression in the human sense. It can also be used to refer to the Palestinians and the suffering that the Israelis [have caused] them. The Palestinians also have their own private Holocaust, and this is also true of the Gypsies, etc.

"What the Zionist leadership in general and the American in particular have tried [to do] is to turn this truly tragic historical event into an industrial enterprise, an enterprise that will bring them a lot of capital, a fortune of wealth.

"For example, they started in Germany in the 1950s with what they called 'reparations' and suddenly, in the second half of the 1990s, they turned, after Germany, to Austria, they turned to Switzerland and began to invent their lies, according to which, the Swiss bought the gold fillings of Jewish victims that the Nazis had taken from the teeth [of the Jews]."

Road map may yet have a chance of succeeding

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

The road map, which seemed still-born after it was released on April 30, may yet have a future. This can be said in the aftermath of Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's second meeting with Mahmoud Abbas (Abu Mazen), the prime minister of the Palestinian Authority. Having conducted what Abbas described as a "serious, candid and beneficial" discussion, he and Sharon were poised to confer with U.S. President George W. Bush at a pivotal summit in Aqaba, Jordan, on June 4.

If the meeting succeeds, a communique will be issued endorsing the short and long-range objectives of this internationally sponsored peace plan: a complete and immediate cessation of violence and a two-state solution by 2005.

Three weeks ago, shortly after the road map was officially unveiled, Sharon and Abbas discussed it at length. The Palestinians had fully embraced the road map, but Israel had yet to completely accept it. Within hours of their encounter, a British suicide bomber recruited by Hamas – which opposes the peace process in general and the road map in particular – killed three Israelis in Tel Aviv. In response, an Israeli armoured force struck the Gaza Strip, killing 12 Palestinians.

After the raid, Israel was rocked by four more suicide bombings in Hebron, Jerusalem, Kfar Darom and Afula that claimed the lives of a dozen people. The road map, which was drawn up by the United States, Russia, the European Union and the United Nations, appeared doomed. But within a week of the fifth suicide bombing, the grim situation brightened.

A year after the Likud rejected Palestinian statehood, Sharon's government, bowing to U.S. pressure, endorsed the road map by a 12-7 margin, with four cabinet ministers abstaining. And in comments bitterly condemned by Israel's far right, Sharon, the godfather of the settlements, declared that Israel's occupation – a word he had never previously used – was untenable.

Israel signed on to the road map after Washington promised to seriously address 14 of its reservations. Even so, Israel agreed to accept only "the steps" in the road map rather than the plan itself. Israel's defence minister, Shaul Mofaz, who had called it "bad for Israel," ended up voting for the road map. But he referred to it as "a declaration of diplomatic intentions," not a binding legal document. In other words, Israel still seeks to amend it. By contrast, the Palestinians have fully accepted it, from "A to Z," as a Palestinian official said recently. They now demand implementation based on firm timelines, as opposed to Israel's preference, performance.

The road map, which looks remarkably like the now-defunct Oslo process, obligates Israel and the Palestinians to take reciprocal confidence-building measures. Broadly speaking, the Palestinians are expected to disarm and dismantle groups such as Hamas and Islamic Jihad, which have perpetrated the majority of suicide bombings. The Palestinians must also issue a clear statement accepting Israel's existence as a Jewish state.

Israel is expected to ease restrictions on Palestinians, impose a freeze on settlement construction and expansion, take down small outposts, withdraw to the pre-intifadah lines and acquiesce to a provisional Palestinian state. During the final phases, permanent status agreements, covering borders, security arrangements, settlements and Jerusalem, are envisioned.

The big unresolved question today is how Israel and the Palestinians can actually implement the road map. Israel is reluctant to make far-reaching concessions before the Palestinian Authority cracks down on terrorism. The Palestinians argue that both sides, in accordance with the road map, must act simultaneously on a whole range of issues. How this procedural wrangle can be settled remains to be seen. At their last meeting on May 29, Abbas reportedly told Sharon that he would persuade Hamas and like-minded organizations to observe a ceasefire. Sharon, who wants a total crackdown, announced that the current curfew would be lifted, that some Palestinian prisoners would be let go and that sequestered tax revenues would be released.

Despite these mutual goodwill gestures, there is still a long, long way to go before the road map is implemented and peace is at hand. But in the post-Saddam Hussein era, peace may yet be possible.

Weizmann, Princess Margaret to honour Toronto doctor

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to the CJN

Dr. John Trachtenberg, director of the Prostate Centre at Princess Margaret Hospital, will be honoured for his clinical and research expertise by the Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute of Science and Princess Margaret Hospital at a gala dinner June 19 at the Sheraton Centre.

Trachtenberg was born in Montreal in 1949 and attended Herzliah High School. He received his B.Sc. and medical degree from McGill University. He completed his urologic residency at McGill in 1978 and then completed a fellowship in prostatic disease at Johns Hopkins University. He and his family moved to Toronto in 1985.

Dr. John Trachtenberg

He holds the prestigious Fleck Tanenbaum Chair in Prostatic Diseases at the University Health Network and the University of Toronto, where he is a professor in the department of surgery and department of medical imaging.

He is also director of prostate services at Mount Sinai Hospital's Murray Koffler Urologic Wellness Centre and acts as a consultant to the urology departments at several other hospitals as well as the Ontario Cancer Foundation.

Trachtenberg has led numerous clinical research trials into less invasive alternatives to standard surgery or radiation treatment for prostate cancer, from using microwaves to combat the disease to current trials of the light-activated, plant-derived drug Tookad, which was developed by Weizmann professors Avigdor Scherz and Yoram Salomon.

Trachtenberg explained that when tissue is illuminated by a special wavelength of light, the combination of drug and light damages blood vessels that feed the cancer. Tookad is cleared from the body within three to four hours of treatment.

"It has the potential to be a remarkable achievement because it is one of the few treatments that will kill the cancer without damaging the normal tissue," he says.

"It is also very exciting because it may be able to be done without invading the body."

Thomas Beck, chairman of Weizmann Canada said Trachtenberg "has been instrumental in the development of new treatments for prostate cancer and has worked to create a greater awareness of the disease."

Trachtenberg called the tribute dinner "a phenomenal honor... It is really the reflection of the hard work of dozens of people all around the world, particularly the Weizmann in Israel, the Princess Margaret and many others."

Trachtenberg is married to Nancy Trachtenberg, who works with students with disabilities at U of T. They have two children, Franklin, 17, and Lianne, 14.

Money raised by the tribute dinner will go to fund a new research chair at the Weizmann Institute and will help fund research and treatment at Princess Margaret.

For details on the tribute dinner, call 416-733-9220.

Zareinu Moveathon has local clergy on the run

More than a dozen synagogues have signed on to participate in the 6th Annual Zareinu Moveathon, to be held Sunday, June 22, at Earl Bales Park.

As part of Zareinu's Clergy on the Run campaign, each shul is putting together a team led by their respective rabbis and cantors who will walk, jog or run the 10-km circuit on city streets in support of students at Zareinu Educational Centre of Metropolitan Toronto, the city's only Jewish day school and treatment centre that provides special education and individualized therapies to children with a wide range of physical and developmental challenges.

Zareinu's Clergy on the Run campaign was initiated last year by Cantor Yaakov Motzen of Shaarei Shomayim Congregation. Together with the synagogue's Rabbi Moshe Shulman and Cantor Shlomo Simcha Sufrin, the Shaarei Shomayim team raised more than $15,000 for Zareinu children.

Participating synagogues this year include Adath Israel Congregation, Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Congregation, Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue, Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, Beth Jacob V'Anshei Drildz Congregation, Beth Sholom Synagogue, Beth Tikvah Synagogue, Chabad Lubavitch of Markham, Clanton Park Synagogue, Kehillat Shaarei Torah, Shaar Shalom Synagogue, Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, Shaarei Tefillah Congregation and Torath Emeth Congregation.

There's also a Zareinu staff team as well as school teams from Bialik Hebrew Day School, Ulpanat Orot and Yeshivat Or Chaim.

The Zareinu Moveathon is a full-day fundraiser featuring athletic events followed by a community picnic and carnival. In addition to the 10K Miracle Run, Moveathon events include 20K, 50K and 100K bicycle rides, a 10K Rollerblade, and a 2K Fun Loop. All events start and end at Earl Bales Park, on Bathurst Street just south of Sheppard Avenue.

For more information or to sign up for an event, call 416-661-1800 or visit www.zareinu.org.

Alexander the Great and the Treasure Chest

Alexander the Great, King of Macedonia and conqueror of a huge area extending all the way from Greece to India, lived more than 2,300 years ago. This story is adapted from the Gemarah.

"Your Honour, Saul sold me the field before I found the chest in it!"

"What difference does that make?" shot back Saul. "I sold the field to Judah."

"Order in the court!" demanded the Honourable Samuel Abraham, and the two men fell silent. Judge Abraham straightened to his full sitting height and looked reproachfully at Saul and Judah. He wasn't usually this formal with the people who came before him to be judged, but, then again, he didn't usually have Alexander the Great sitting next to him.

Alexander of Macedon! Alexander the Conqueror! Alexander, who, in his current visit to to Israel, had asked to see how the Jews judged in their courts. And when you're the conqueror of the world, you usually get your way.

"Gentleman," announced Judge Abraham. "Let me make sure I have your story correctly. Saul sold his field to Judah. While Judah was plowing, he uprooted a rock and discovered under it a small chest containing precious stones and gold."

"These Jews are just like Macedonians," thought Alexander. "We get this all the time. 'It's my field now, so I should get to keep it.' 'No, I only sold you a field, not a treasure chest, so give it back!' I bet the judge is going to kill them both and take it for himself. That's what I would do."

But the judge wasn't finished talking. "Judah wants to give it back, but Saul refuses to take it."

"What?" thought Alexander, puzzled.

"Judah, is this correct?" continued the judge.

"Yes, Your Honour. When I bought the field from him, he agreed to sell me the land, the orchards, the spring of water. He never meant to sell me a treasure box, and I never intended to buy one. To keep it, in my opinion, would be theft."

"Saul?" said the Judge.

"Your Honor, everything you have said is correct. But when I sold the field, I specified I was selling it and everything in it. Since this box was in it, it was sold as well. I cannot take it back."

"But you never meant to sell me such a valuable treasure!" countered Judah. "You just meant that you were selling me the gardening tools and the well! You never had anything like this in mind!"

Alexander listened, stunned, as the judge contemplated the case before him.

"Judah," he finally said, " I believe you have a son who is looking to get married."

"Yes," answered Judah, unsure of where the judge was going with this.

"And you, Saul, have an eligible daughter."

"Yes."

"Why not introduce them to each other? And if indeed they decide to marry, you can give them the treasure as a wedding gift. Sound fair?"

"Well I never!" burst out Alexander. "This whole case makes no sense! And the verdict. Why, where I come from the judge would just kill them both and take the money for himself."

The Honourable Samuel Abraham fixed the conqueror of the world with a pointed stare. "Do you have animals where you come from?"

"Yes." replied Alexander.

"And does the sun shine there?"

"Uh, Yes."

"Well, I can tell you that it only does so for the sake of the animals, because the people of your land do not deserve to see the light of day!"

LOGIC PUZZLE

Using the map and clues, can you discover the locations of all the items in Judah's fields and home?

1. The treasure is not in or near South Field.
2. East Field contains water.
3. There is no water source at Home.
4. The spring is not in East Field.
5. The plow is next to the orchard.
6. The spring is far from Home.
7. The plow is next to the treasure.
8. The orchard is not at home.

Risking a 'Rocket Richard' card to win it all

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Most kids like to collect things. It might be teddy bears or rocks or stamps. Many collect different kinds of cards, especially of sports figures.

That's what Uncle Jack used to do, in Jack Siemiatycki and Avi Slodovnick's terrific book The Hockey Card (Lobster Press, 2002, illustrations by Doris Barrette).

Children's Books

When Uncle Jack was a little boy, all the kids in his school collected and traded hockey cards. They even played games to try to win cards from each other. Each one wanted to have the most cards.

One day, Uncle Jack was challenged to a game by the "biggest card shark in the whole school," Sylvester Kornpot. The winner would get all of the loser's cards.

Uncle Jack really didn't want to play, but he knew that if he didn't, the other guys would call him a chicken.

The game began at lunchtime. At first, the two boys' wins and losses were about even, but slowly, Sylvester began to win. Finally, Uncle Jack was down to just one card, his favourite, of Maurice "the Rocket" Richard.

Now, you may not have ever heard of Rocket Richard. For a long time, he played right wing for the Montreal Canadiens. Many people consider him one of the greatest hockey players there ever was.

Uncle Jack had no choice – he had to play that card. He threw down the card. To his shock, he won. And, using the Richard card, he kept winning.

How did that happen? Well, really it was just a matter of luck. Or was it? Uncle Jack says he "could have sworn Rocket Richard winked at him."

In the book, Uncle Jack tells the story of the hockey card to his nephew, who is having a birthday (we never find out the nephew's name). You will get a kick out of the pictures Doris Barrette put in the book. The nephew goes to sleep wearing a hockey shirt, there is a hockey poster over his bed and hockey equipment is all over the bedroom.

Business Profile

CEO built his security business one customer at a time

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

We've all heard the drill: "This is the AlarmForce Central station, identify yourself immediately. The police have been dispatched."

Does this anonymous voice coming out of a box in your family room really scare intruders off?

"You bet," says Joel Matlin, 54, founder, president and CEO of AlarmForce, the largest two-way voice alarm company in Canada, which has traded on the Toronto Stock Exchange since 1997.

"If you were breaking into a house and heard that, would you hang around?"

Matlin, a graduate of Concordia University in Montreal, is familiar to many people because he has pitched his product on countless radio and television commercials. The native Montrealer has lived in Toronto for about 25 years.

He started AlarmForce in 1988 after spending almost 20 years at his first company, Frisco Bay, a video surveillance firm he developed when he was 25 that provided security for banks across the country.

"I had been in the home alarm system in the late '70s when I opened a division of Frisco Bay called Alarmtron. I sold that after two years, but it is still in existence in Montreal and Vancouver."

"I wanted to get back into the home alarm business, and I wanted to develop affordable, user-friendly technology. I conceived the idea for a two-way voice alarm because I did not believe in the existing technology.

"I looked for an engineer who could develop the interactive technology for me, and after two years we were ready to roll. We designed our unique technology first, and then we set out to market it," Matlin says.

'We designed our unique technology first, and then we set out to market it'

It took about two years to educate people, "because it's always difficult to sell a new concept, but the bottom line is that it is logical, and logic always prevails."

When a house alarm is sounded, he says, a live operator proves to the intruder that someone knows there is a break-in happening. "We have verification that something is going on.

"Some people claim that the system allows for eavesdropping, but it is not possible. Our two-way technology is only designed to respond to a signal. It cannot initiate a call."

Not only does his system make sense as far as security is concerned, he says, it also makes sense budget-wise.

"My business philosophy is to give people the absolute best value for their money. We deliver the best technology at the lowest possible cost.

"If we can give the customer value, and at the same time make a little money, then that's great."

Currently, Matlin has about 100 employees in his 30 offices across the country, but all monitoring, design, software engineering and manufacturing takes place in the company's Don Mills head office.

He has control over every aspect of the company's operations, Matlin says, from manufacturing and developing the alarm system and software to in-house sales and monitoring.

"The fact that we operate our own central monitoring station not only makes it cost efficient, but stringent standards can be guaranteed, and systems and procedures are firmly in place to handle any emergency," he says.

"We have more than 30,000 self-created accounts. We are not an acquisition company, and we have not purchased any competitors' systems. All our accounts have been created internally."

Risk to the company is fairly low, Matlin says, because it deals with with 30,000 individual accounts. "We're not dealing in the commercial sector where we could stand to lose a huge block of retail stores. As far as a downturn in economy is concerned, that could be a good thing for us, because the crime increases."

Over the last five years, he says, "revenues, derived from customer contracts, have grown by 21 per cent, and we're forecasting growth of 21 per cent this year and 20 per cent in 2004.

"We have tremendous recurring revenues, we have been profitable since 1990 and we have a tremendous team of people that run a good business," he says.

Under its standard customer contract, the company charges a fixed monthly fee for the system, which includes monitoring, and AlarmForce retains ownership of the equipment.

As the company's base of subscribers expands with each system installed, its total monthly recurring revenues from subscribers increases, resulting in growth in operating margins and cash flow.

A March 2003 report by Northern Securities Inc. recommended AlarmForce – which was trading last week on the TSX in the $1.49 range, down from a 52-week high of $1.85 – as a strong buy, which means it expects the share price to appreciate 30 per cent or more over the next 12 months.

The report called the company "an exciting opportunity for investors interested in benefiting from the trend towards monitored two-way voice home security systems."

Matlin says the stock is undervalued compared to other national and international alarm companies, "but we do expect that to change. The price certainly does not reflect the value of the company."

The key to his success, Matlin says, is that he runs "a very focused organization. We don't focus on high-end integrated systems on the commercial side of the business. We focus on the marketplace.

"We build the business one customer at a time, and we stick to the market and work to make it more successful."

The company also has low debt levels, he says. "Our cash flow and our margins are significant, and we have been able to increase them. A strong balance sheet gives us the opportunity to expand aggressively."

Matlin says AlarmForce is a feel-good business. "Our customers are happy because we make them feel more comfortable in their homes, and our employees are loyal because we create a comfortable working environment."

Customers know that AlarmForce cares for them individually, he says, "and that's the key to this business. We care about each client, so when a problem occurs in our business we have certain operating procedures in place that focus in on dealing and resolving each individual problem.

"As well, because [AlarmForce] is a public company, a large percentage of our staff is involved in stock options, so an opportunity to help the company grow is in their favour."

Although he works 60 "crazy" hours a week, he says he tries to maintain balance in his life.

"I belong to Adath Israel Synagogue, I play hockey three times a week, I travel, I make sure I work at the Hadassah Bazaar every year, and I make time for my daughter, who is a lawyer, and my son, who is a film producer in Hollywood.

"If you don't balance work and the rest of your life, everything gets out of whack."

Sonny Goldstein, CFP
President

BUDAPEST INSTEAD OF BEIJING FOR TRAVEL NETWORK TRAVELERS

Bonnie Horowitz and Vivien Rethazy of The Travel Network are offering a repeat of their popular Budapest/Vienna and Prague Jewish Heritage Tour for the fall, departing Oct. 14 and returning Oct. 26. In previous years the company's Jewish tours to that region of Europe have been sold out and participants have returned with rave reviews.

The company had planned to conduct a cruise tour of Southeast Asia during October but dropped the Asian itinerary because of the SARS situation there. The tour would have been a first for the company. It would have started in Beijing and finished in Bangkok, and included much Jewish content in both of those cities as well as in Shanghai.

Bookings had been strong and had started coming in as early as six months ago, Horowitz reported. However, she and Rethazy had already recognized the necessity of postponing the cruise when Princess Cruise Lines called to announce the cancellation.

Horowitz and Rethazy returned in May from one of the company's Jewish heritage tours of northern Spain. The group visited Madrid, Toledo, Segovia, Burgos, Bilboa, Barcelona, Gerona and Beselu, and were privileged to have Rabbi Benito Garzon, former chief rabbi of Madrid, accompany them through Toledo.

Kosher WindSurfer: Torontonians David and Naomi Freudmann are escorting a glatt kosher Caribbean cruise aboard the Wind Surf deluxe sailing ship (chalav Yisrael under KSA supervision) departing San Juan, Puerto Rico, on January 25, 2004. The seven-day cruise drops anchor in Virgin Gorda, Marigot St. Martin, St. Barthelemy, Nevis and Dominica, thus taking in "an exclusive yachtsman's itinerary among the Caribbean's most upscale, least crowded islands."

David Freudmann, travel consultant for UniWorld Travel & Tours, still speaks glowingly of his previous voyage on the Wind Surf 2 1/2 years ago. The ship carries some 300 passengers, cared for by 175 attentive staff; all staterooms and suites are oversized and have ocean views. Rates start at US $1,999, per person double occupancy, exclusive of air transportation, port taxes and gratuities.

Sailing dates of Dec. 7 and Jan. 18, 2004, are also available. For brochure or further information, contact Freudmann at UniWorld, 416-493-3322. E-mail david@uniworldtravel.com.

There is hip-hop BeyondEden

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

When you're in a Jewish rock-reggae-hip-hop band, how do you make your tunes accessible to diverse youth?

A rapping sermon, of course: "Word of God is what you need, and what you need will set you free."

In the past four months, Singer Chayim Newman has blasted those lyrics – and many others – with his Toronto band BeyondEden at venues such as the Reverb, the Toronto Centre for the Arts and the Hard Rock Café, as well as at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT).

Chayim Newman of BeyondEden.

The band, which consists of singer-guitarist Newman, drummer Jono Landon, keyboardist Dave Austin, guitarist Mark Weinstock, bassist Mark Shapiro and percussionist Eldan Cohen, is lapping up the buzz their multi-genre music has created.

Not only does the seven-member BeyondEden play with a toe-tapping blend of hip-hop and reggae-dipped funk, but the group includes Jewish references that reflect their passionate mission.

In an interview with Landon and Newman at Toronto's Symposium Café, Landon said, "We speak to the religious and non-religious. We want to spark Jewish youth and give them a great Jewish band to listen to."

Newman, 23, said many Jewish kids listen to groups such as the Dave Matthews Band who don't have a Jewish theme to which they can relate. But BeyondEden, he said, "passes along a 4,000-year-old message of Jewish unity and hope for a better future." It's not surprising, then, that one of the band's signature hits is called Better Days.

"In psychology, I learnt there are two ways to deal with trauma: fear or anger," said Newman, who studied psychology at the University of Toronto.

"The song Better Days reacts to what Israel goes through – the boy in the song reacts with vengeance, and the girl with fear."

Landon, 24, believes all Jews can relate to BeyondEden's music. "Even youth who don't know about religion will like our songs."

The band has accumulated an impressive concert resumé since its formation about a year-and-a-half ago and has attracted many young followers to its high-energy and frenetic riffs and its exciting Steve-Wonder-meets-Bob-Marley style.

And the hip-hop that might make parents cringe? "Rap is the poetry of today. I look at what's selling and it's that and pop, so I realize we have to get our point across the best way possible."

Newman and Landon admit they have grand visions for full-time music careers, as long as they can also live a Jewish lifestyle at the same time.

"We still follow halachah," Landon said. "We still have to be responsible to our religion."

That divine dedication is evident in BeyondEden's pre-show ritual. Before a concert, the band's seven members link arms and close their eyes. To pump themselves up, they hum a tune from an artist many older people would recognize – Shlomo Carlebach, popularly known as the "chassidic minstrel."

Just as Carlebach ignited the Jewish world with his music, BeyondEden hopes to accomplish the Canadian equivalent. And if the kids listen closely, they'll hear funky notes of optimism that inspire.

Lawyer struggles with a haunting murder

By PHYLLIS SHRAGGE
Special to The CJN

HAMILTON — The Golden Age of Monsters— or My Father Gave Me Hannah Arendt's "Eichmann in Jerusalem" for My Twentieth Birthday, a one-character play depicting the burdens faced by children of Holocaust survivors, will be presented at the Hamilton Fringe Theatre Festival from June 6 to 15 and at the Toronto Fringe Theatre Festival from July 2 to 13.

The Golden Age of Monsters, written by PEI playwright and fiction writer J.J. Steinfeld, stars Barry Bender of Hamilton, as Stuart, a 54-year old Jewish criminal lawyer struggling with a haunting murder case that he can't quite comprehend.

The impending trial launches him on a journey of dreams and recollections. He confronts "inconsiderate" monsters from world history to "B" movies in locations as diverse as a Toronto massage parlour to his mother's back door.

Stuart's parents survived the Holocaust, fleeing from Poland to Russia, and immigrated to Canada after the war. Stuart's life has been shaped by this experience and his own struggle to face the "monsters."

Steinfeld, of Charlottetown, is the recipient of the 2003 Award for Distinguished Contribution to the Literary Arts on Prince Edward Island, an honour presented by the PEI Council of the Arts.

Thirty-one of his one-act and full-length plays have been performed or broadcast throughout North America in various forms, ranging from staged readings to full productions.

His play, Past Artistry, won Regina Little Theatre's 2003 National Playwriting Contest and will be produced there in 2004. Steinfeld has won Theatre PEI's annual playwriting competition 10 times (seven times in the one-act play category, once in the radio play category and twice in the full-length play category). His new short-story collection Would You Hide Me? has just been published by Gaspereau Press.

The Golden Age of Monsters is directed by Ellen Jaffe and Lil Blume under the auspices of Pinking Shears Productions, a company Jaffe, Blume and Bender, all of Hamilton, formed in 2002.

Jaffe is a poet and writer whose book, Writing Your Way received the 2002 Non-Fiction Book Award from Hamilton Region Arts Council. She has written an adaptation for the stage of Margaret Laurence's children's novel Jason's Quest that was produced by Adventures in Children's Theatre in 2001.

Jaffe and Blume, a writer and teacher, co-ordinated the Celebration of Jewish Writers and Writing workshop in Hamilton in May, 2002.

Bender, whose working life has spanned teaching, technical writing, merchant banking and consulting, has acted in community and repertory theatre.

The play will be performed in Hamilton at UP Lounge, 3rd floor, Manhattan Connection, 35 Main St. Tickets are $8. The Hamilton fringe schedule can be found at www.hamiltonfringe.ca or by calling 905-297-0170.

The play will be performed in Toronto at the Royal George Theatre, 120 Howland Ave. Tickets are $10 in advance and $8 at the door. Dates can be found at www.fringetoronto.com or by calling 416-966-1062.

British writer adapted The Pianist for the screen

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Filmmaker Roman Polanski clearly knew what he was doing when he hired a seasoned British screenwriter to produce the script for The Pianist.

He needed someone special – a person acquainted with the Holocaust, sensitive to Jewish history, familiar with music and adept at turning a phrase.

Much to everyone's satisfaction, Polanski proved to be a superb judge of talent.

Enter Ronald Harwood.

Better still, Adrien Brody, who portrayed Wladyslaw Szpilman, the central figure in the film, walked away with the Oscar for best actor, while Polanski himself received the Oscar for best director.

Ronald Harwood

The Pianist, which will be available on DVD and video in Canada on May 27, has earned about $32 million (US) in North America.

Canadian revenues alone have exceeded $5 million.

In a recent telephone interview from his home in Britain, Harwood speculated that Polanski handed him the plum assignment because of his track record.

Since 1963, Harwood has written more than a dozen scripts, from One Day in the Life of Ivan Denisovich to A Fine Romance.

In 1983, he earned his first Oscar by adapting his play, The Dresser, for the screen. Critically acclaimed, it starred Peter Yates, Albert Finney and Tom Courtenay.

In addition, Harwood wrote Taking Sides for the Hungarian director Istvan Szabo. Scheduled to be released in July, Taking Sides is based on the life of the German conductor Wilhelm Furtwangler, the subject of a painful de-Nazification process after World War II.

"Polanski thought, 'This guy knows about Nazis and music.'"

It's an open question whether Polanski was aware that Harwood has also written two novels with strong Jewish themes.

Home, an autobiographical novel published almost a decade ago and the winner of the Jewish Quarterly Prize for fiction, revolves around a Jewish immigrant from Lithuania who settles in South Africa.

The Guilt Merchants, published in 1962, depicts a Nazi war criminal who hides as a Jew in South America.

Polanski, whose credits run the gamut from Knife in the Water and Repulsion to Rosemary's Baby and Chinatown, contacted Harwood in early 2000.

By the end of the year, the pair were working on The Pianist.

"I spent six weeks with Polanski," said Harwood. "He's a wonderful colleague and a terrific chap."

Harwood acknowledged that he had never heard of Szpilman, a renowned concert pianist whose immediate family was murdered by the Nazis.

After Warsaw's liberation, Szpilman wrote Death of a City, which came out in Poland in 1946. The book was subsequently banned by the Communist government.

Death of a City was published in Germany in 1999 and then in Britain under the title of The Pianist: The Extraordinary True Story of One Man's Survival in Warsaw, 1939-1945.

Szpilman, who retired in 1986, died on July 6, 2000.

"I was determined to keep that tone, to write it from Szpilman's point of view. That was the hardest thing. The temptation was to dramatize, but I tried to avoid that."

Did he expect to win an Oscar for The Pianist?

"Don't be silly," he exclaimed.

The odds-on favourite, he said, was David Hare, the scriptwriter of The Hours, starring Nicole Kidman and Meryl Streep.

"I was in total shock for quite a while after winning," he said. "It's an amazing event when it happens to you."

A publicist who met Harwood after his unexpected triumph said he looked completely dazed.

The next day, he got 15 screenwriting offers.

Since the success of The Pianist, Harwood, who is also a playwright, has been quite busy.

He has produced a new play with a Jewish theme, An English Tragedy, and he has written the script for a forthcoming HBO television movie about British Holocaust denier David Irving's celebrated trial.

The film is scheduled to begin shooting in 2004.

Harwood, whose original name was Horwitz, was born in Cape Town, South Africa, in 1934.

His father, Isaac, a Lithuanian Jew, immigrated to South Africa in 1898. His mother was a Londoner of Polish origin.

Harwood left Cape Town at 17 to study acting in London. He never went back to live in South Africa, though he has visited frequently and the country has figured quite prominently in his career.

Harwood adapted Alan Paton's novel, Cry, the Beloved Country, set in South Africa, into a movie.

Two of his novels, Articles of Faith and George Washington September, Sir, were inspired by South Africa.

A resident of London, Harwood is chair of the Royal Society of Literature, and from 1993 to 1997, he was president of international PEN, an association of writers and editors that promotes literacy and human rights.

GARDINER MUSEUM DISPLAYS DONATED MILRAD CERAMICS

More than 90 important ceramic works that lawyer Aaron Milrad donated to the Gardiner Museum of Ceramic Art in 1999 are soon to go on view there in a new exhibit titled Life Taking Shape: Ceramics from the Aaron Milrad Collection.

The show, which opens June 18 and runs until July 27, features works by "some of the most important ceramic artists working in Canada, the United States and Britain over the last 50 years," according to museum curator Susan Jefferies.

Pieces donated by Milrad will later be highlighted in a new contemporary gallery, Jefferies said.

A well-known Toronto-based arts and cultural lawyer who is an expert in copyright and media law, Milrad has long been an avid collector of 20th-century ceramics.

"Clay is such a living thing," he said. "It brings into play all four elements – earth, fire, water and air. My passion for ceramics began back in my law school days, when I took a night class at the Ontario College of Art and worked on the wheel. From that day on, I didn't collect ceramics, they collected me."

The museum's Web site – www.gardinermuseum.on.ca – lists dates when the public may meet the collector, curator and various artists. Gardiner Museum of Ceramic Art, 111 Queen's Park. 416-586-8080.

Cinematic Success Story: The Burial Society, a Canadian-produced film starring Rob LaBelle and Jan Rubes, continues to garner praise and attention since taking the $12,000 Citytv prize in 2002 for best western Canadian screenplay at the Vancouver International Film Festival.

More recently, the Nicholas Racz-directed feature scored eight Leo Award nominations and has been invited to more than 20 film festivals. It was produced by Richard Baumgartel and Howard Dancyger and also stars Seymour Cassel and David Paymer.

The film is a "caper drama" focused on Sheldon Kasner, a squeaky-clean accountant at the Hebrew National Bank who, unlikely as it seems, breaks the law and hides out with the local chevrah kadishah or Jewish burial society.

This is a first feature film for Racz, a former winner of the KickStart Short Film Award from Telefilm Canada and the Directors Guild of Canada. The Burial Society enjoyed recent theatrical runs in Calgary and Ottawa and is slated for screening in the United States in the fall. In the Spotlight: ShakespeareWorks is an educational program developed five years ago by award-winning actor R.H. Thomson and actor-educator Marvin Karon, a member of the Beth Jacob synagogue in Hamilton, Ont.

Sponsored by the Toronto District School Board, Thomson and Karon have visited more than 300 schools in Canada to demystify the works of the Bard with the aid of a long list of notable actors, including Paul Gross, Fiona Reid, Ted Dykstra, Tamara Hickey, Kenneth Welsh and Sonja Smits.

Several private schools, including Hebrew schools, have shown interest in the program. ShakespeareWorks has also expanded into a summer camp, which launches its second season this July. 416-502-1209.

Three-disc Pianist DVD now available

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

One of the truly great films of the year 2002, The Pianist, is now available on video and DVD.

The Pianist won Academy Awards for best director (Roman Polanski), best actor (Adrien Brody) and best adapted screenplay (Ronald Harwood). It also walked away with the Palme D'Or at the Cannes Film Festival last year.

The story revolves around Wladislaw Szpilman, a remarkable composer and pianist, who is caught up in events that overwhelm him and devastate the world around him.

After the Nazi occupation of Poland, Szpilman, a Jew, was targeted by the Germans. He managed to survive the war because of the efforts of his friends, many of whom were not Jews, who hid and protected him.

As a result, Szpilman spent several years in hiding and living in secrecy. From these hiding places, Szpilman was witness to the horrendous events taking place in Warsaw, including the Ghetto Uprising and the Polish attempt, a year later, to revolt against the occupation. Both efforts proved futile.

For the film's director, Roman Polanski, this was a project close to his heart. As a young boy, he witnessed the German atrocities and survived the Krakow Ghetto. Polanski's memories and experiences played a major part in his recreation of the time period and by adding realistic touches to the film.

Polanski himself put it this way: "I survived the bombing of Warsaw and the Krakow Ghetto and I wanted to recreate those childhood visions.....In addition to my own recollections, I could rely on the authenticity of Szpilman's account. He wrote it just after the war--perhaps that's why the story is so strong, so genuine, and so fresh."

In addition, a brilliant performance by Adrien Brody gives the film the final touch of realism that places it head and shoulders above all other films produced last year.

The DVD version of The Pianist includes a 3 disc set. One disc contains the two and a half hour film. The second disc contains the special features, which include A Story of Survival featurette, a Director's Note by Polanski, an interview with Polanski, a featurette called The Warsaw Ghetto: Historical Background, a biography of Szpilman, and many more items.

The third disc is the original motion picture soundtrack including Chopin's Mazurka in A minor, Op. 17, No. 42 performed by Szpilman himself. This is certainly one video or DVD that deserves to be in everyone's collection.

Tiny tae kwon do star vying for national title

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Phyllis Saadon has been taking her daughter, Mia, to tae kwon do classes and competitions for six years, but there's one move performed by her daughter that still awes her.

It's the one where 12-year-old Mia, all of four-foot-10 and 76 lbs., runs across the gym, leaps over seven or eight kids huddled in a crouch position, and splits a one-inch board with a flying side kick. That's all in the air, over eight kids, with her foot.

Mia, of course, is no ordinary kid. Though young and slight of frame, she's already earned the heady title of first-degree black belt, and has a trophy case brimming with about 50 shiny awards.

Last month in Colborne, Ont., Mia finished first in the Junior Ontario Provincial Tournament in the super fin category, a class that brings together kids of the same age and weight.

The win puts her in contention for a spot on the national team and on June 27, she'll be in Winnipeg to compete in the Canadian junior national tournament.

Mia has been passionate about the sport ever since she took it up at age six. Phyllis would know – she's the one who's spent the last six years driving her daughter to her training sessions at Chu's Martial Arts three or four times a week and to competitions on the weekend.

Her coach and mentor, Thanh Chu, himself a third-degree black belt and tournament competitor, believes Mia has what it takes to excel in the sport far into the future.

"Ever since she was six, she's been such a hard worker. She never gives up. She puts in a lot of dedication and a lot of hours into her training," he said.

What's more, he continued, she has natural ability. "She's very athletic, coordinated, has good balance, form, body movements and mechanics."

Her natural abilities allow her to master the pattern aspect of the sport, in which participants go through a choreographed series of movements "that is like telling a story with your body," Chu said.

She's also very good at the sport's tougher, sparring aspect in which athletes wearing protective gear land blows on their opponents.

Despite the hard-nosed aspect of the sport, Phyllis is supportive of her daughter's participation in it. "I feel that whatever interests a child and if they like it and are determined, they should do it," she said.

Mia has been attracted to tae kwon do right from the get-go. When she was six, her mom was taking her to a computer class in the same building as the martial arts school when little Mia looked in and said, "I want to do that."

Phyllis is happy with her choice. "It gives her a focus," she said. "She's not in the shopping malls very much and she's working out."

Chu said Mia's story is somewhat unusual. Tae kwon do is still a sport taken up mostly by boys, but Mia has become a role model for even younger girls. They all want to emulate her, he said.

Bridge with Gitelman

Each year in early May, The Cavendish Invitational Pairs is held in Las Vegas. In this event 50 of the world's best partnerships compete for close to $1 million in total prize money. This tournament has always been my favorite and I have played in every Cavendish Invitational for the past 6 years. This year my partner, Brad Mass, and I happened to win. Woohoo! Here is one of our triumphs:

South opened the bidding with an emaciated weak 2 bid in spades. North forced with 3♥ and raised South's 3♠ rebid to 4♠.

Leading a side suit singleton against a trump contract often allows the defenders to win a later trick (or tricks) with a ruff. With my hand I dismissed the lead of my singleton club because I thought it was very likely that I had 2 trump winners – I did not need any ruffs! Instead I chose to make an opening lead from my strength – diamonds. As you will see, this turned out to be a good idea!

Brad won the first trick with the ♦A and returned the ♦9 to my ♦K. I persisted with a 3rd round of diamonds. The dummy's ♦Q won the trick as the declarer discarded a club. He then continued with a trump to his ♠9 with my ♠10.

When a defender leads a suit in which both the declarer and the dummy are void, he is conceding what is known as a "ruff and discard". In most deals a ruff and discard allows the declarer to win a trick that he is not entitled to. Ruff and discards usually help the declarer – not the defenders.

Fortunately I was able to figure out that this deal was not like most deals. I played a 4th round of diamonds and Brad ruffed with the ♠A – the setting trick for the defense. I still had the ♠KJ poised over the declarer's ♠Q. There was nothing he could do to stop me from winning 2 more trump tricks. The declarer's ♠4 contract had failed by 3 tricks.

Frank Ekstein: a godly atheist

All men die. Some men die harder.

I met Frank Ekstein a few years ago, on a day much like any other. He invited me to meet with him at the offices of his company, Weston Forest Corp., to discuss some ongoing humanitarian projects.

I stepped into Weston expecting to meet a man with a corporate bravado who would take a bottom-line, no-nonsense approach to my proposals for his participation. Instead, I discovered a soft-spoken and elegant figure surrounded by pictures of horse scenes.

Frank passed away a few weeks ago. He was a beautiful and genuine human being who lived his life with splendour, elegance and love.

All of us have love in our lives. We sculpt it and we grow it. Then there are others who breathe love and its many fragrant smells. Frank Ekstein was such a man.

Frank loved his wife Anita, unconditionally, romantically and with the commitment to a spouse we all crave. He loved his children Ruth, Rick and Peter and their spouses the way Jacob in the Bible loved his children – with unabashed passion. In Rick's final salute to his father, he spoke about the horse rides the two would take down to a pond that was home to their intimate father-son discussions. Ruth talked about their father-daughter horse and buggy rides and the wonderful curiosity Frank had about her life.

In Peter's eulogy of his father, he said, "I was blessed with the opportunity of being able to work together with him. I used to come into his office a half a dozen times a day, usually just to give him a hug. He made me feel safe and that everything was going to be OK. I don't feel so safe anymore."

Frank loved his grandchildren, nephews and nieces. He loved his employees and considered their welfare long before the profits they could make for the company.

Frank loved his horses. He was a Jewish horse-whisperer, an unusual thing to find in our community.

And Frank loved to help others. Once he called me and said, "Avrum, if you ever meet someone who can't pay their rent or needs help immediately, call me." I did, and Frank never, ever said no – regardless of whether a receipt would be issued or not.

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

Frank and I would often speak about his atheist philosophy. Intrigued by a belief in what seemed to be "nothingness," I once asked Frank what it was like not to have a God in his life. He squirmed just a bit, smiled as he looked straight in my eyes in an unthreatening way, and said ever so sweetly, "You know, Avrum, sometimes it is very hard, but what can I do. That's what I believe."

When I heard that Frank had died, I couldn't help but wonder what he and God would discuss. Would God rebuke Frank for not believing in him?

And then I realized that Frank lived a life that was imbued with godliness. He shared himself with Anita and those around him. He cared for his horses like Rebecca cared for Eliezer's camels. Although he was not a practising Jew, he was a role model for all of us in terms of how to actualize tikkun olam – repairing the world.

All men die. But people like Frank, who stopped by our world for a brief period, die a bit harder. They do because their legacy of love and caring are classic and universal.

Good bye, Frank. Thank you for coming along and enhancing our world. To quote your son Peter, we who knew you or were affected by you are now both the luckiest and unluckiest people in the world. Lucky, because you shared your world with us. Unlucky, because you are gone.

You did well Frank. So long, my friend. Regards to God, I think.

About Life

Dear Ella,

Most parents work very hard to mould and shape their children to become responsible adults.

Is it possible that Brian, my 19-year-old son, is just going through a phase? He has a girlfriend now – not necessarily someone I would have chosen for him, but nevertheless she is his girlfriend.

The two spend all their extra time together at my house, in the basement, on the couch, with the remote control close at hand.

What's that all about – two young kids spending all their time growing mouldy in a dingy basement? You might think they were doing something else, right? Wrong. I peep. I know I shouldn't but I have to check.

I've tried my best to suggest to Brian he try other things, but he ignores me and goes back to the basement. Any suggestions?

Blobs in the Basement

Dear Blobs in the Basement,

I presented your problem to the women of the Orah chapter of NJCW. Many of them have teenage children and here are some of their suggestions.

The most unanimous response was: Don't look for trouble where there isn't any. Being a teenager in these times, Brian could be into so many other detrimental activities. Whether it be because of peer pressure, rebellion or boredom, kids can get into very problematic situations, including drugs, gangs and violence. At least Brian is home with his girlfriend right under your nose. You know he is safe.

This is a phase. It won't last forever. Many teenagers are a bit on the lethargic side. I don't think it is unusual to hear of a teenager sleeping till three or four in the afternoon. That too is a phase. We all grow up, whether we want to or not. We all enter life in the real world and these things fade away.

You can't always say no to everything, so pick your fights. This one isn't worthy of a confrontation. You have given Brian suggestions and he knows you are not thrilled about how he spends his leisure time. Leave it at that for a while and see how it progresses. He'll surface soon.

Your first impressions of a party include flowers

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

When you go to a party, greet the other guests, and look over the hall, many of your first impressions are visual.

First impressions are formed on such things as the flowers, says Monika Sumra of Desert Rose Flowers and Gifts Inc. (905-709-0408; www.desertrose.ca). As an integral part of party decor, flowers should be chosen with care. Sumra's motto is, "Your special occasion is our special occasion."

There are a lot of florists out there. To find the best, Mario Seguin of The Floral Studio Limited (416-504-1850) says to start looking as soon as possible. That gives you time to get to know the florist, and gives him or her time to visit your venue.

Seguin has worked in a flower shop since age 12, and has owned his studio since 1992. He places a high value on choosing an experienced florist – someone who not only knows flowers, but what arrangements and colours work best in different venues on different occasions.

This, he says, entails knowing about different halls, their lighting, colour schemes, layout and other characteristics. As he puts it: "You can't redesign the hall, but you can personalize it with flowers."

Planning and hosting a party is stressful, as you undoubtedly know. One of the reasons you consult specialists, Sumra says, is to relieve that stress. Your florist, like any other party professional, should take some of the pressure off you.

Above all, Seguin says, your florist should put your needs first. A specialist's expertise can guide you, but ultimately you make the final decision.

Seguin places a high value on providing service with a positive attitude.

"I'll always find ways to make things work," he says. "There are no problems, only solutions."

Sumra says it's best to choose a florist who not only provides the flowers, but takes care of all the visual aspects of the party. These include things you'd expect from a florist, such as centrepieces, floral design, bouquets and corsages, but also other elements such as invitations, lighting, fabric draping on pillars and backdrops.

Work with one professional to harmonize all these visual aspects, Sumra says.

Using different companies for different products – say, draping and backdrops from one supplier, flowers from another – can detract from that cohesion.

Sumra says a florist should not only set things up, but also take them down at the end of the evening. This makes life easier for you, as well as the other people working in the hall, and helps the florist build a good reputation in the industry.

"Few florists offer this level of service," says Sumra. "But look for someone who does — someone who realizes that their business is as much a matter of service, as physical product."

Seguin agrees that a good florist works well, not only with clients, but with the other people working at the venue, everyone from the waiters to the superintendent. Being considerate, tidying up and not making extra work for other people helps the florist establish goodwill, and increases the likelihood of their being invited back.

Book your florist a year in advance, Seguin recommends, if you want to see in the shop the same flowers that will be in season at the time of your event. Six months in advance is long enough to deal with logistics and co-ordinate the florist's work with other party professionals such as the caterers.

It's best to book your florist as soon as you have a date, Sumra says. You need to make sure they're available, and she's taking bookings into 2004 and 2005.

Warm and rich styles and colours are in, says stylist Ronen Abergel

By LAUREN KRUGEL
CJN Intern

Ronen Abergel tugs and twists his client's freshly cropped jet-black hair – a round brush in one hand, a blowdryer in the other.

The motions seem to come fluidly and naturally as he chats with employees and clients in a boisterous mix of English and Hebrew.

Abergel, who opened up his own salon in Thornhill (905-771-1084) two years ago, styled hair in Tel Aviv for nearly two decades before setting up shop in Canada.

With a barrage of proms, bar and bat mitzvahs and weddings on the horizon, the flamboyant stylist knows he has his work cut out for him, so to speak.

While there are no hard and fast rules for hair styles this spring, soft and natural is the way to go, he says.

Long, flowing tresses are what prom-goers, bat mitzvahs and brides-to-be may want to consider for their affairs, as opposed to severe or complicated up-dos.

Although Abergel emphasizes the importance of keeping up with all the trends, he says he tries his best to accommodate his clients' individual styles.

For proms this season, he says people have been asking for "lots of funky styles with pieces coming down… All the crazy stuff." Feathers, spikes and ringlets make for a unique and fun look.

However, for weddings and bar and bat mitzvahs, he says "a classic, smooth look" is a tried-and-true favourite.

Hair colours this season adhere to the same idea as styles: natural, warm and rich.

This low-key look can be achieved by combining two or three different shades. This doesn't mean highlights. Rather, different shades are mixed together, tone on tone. A popular combination, says Abergel is a blend of copper, blond and dark brown for a luminous but natural-looking sheen.

In addition to hair cutting, styling and colouring, the salon also has a full esthetics studio. Estheticians with more than 30 years of experience can do anything from waxing to facials for everyday maintenance or a special treat before a party.

Although clients often take care of their own makeup, Abergel's salon has two makeup artists on duty to help in the party-preparation process.

His shop doesn't do nails, but next door on Yonge Street is Sensation Nails. The two businesses support each other by sharing clientele.

Abergel says the best way for him to help his clients get ready for an affair is to look at the whole picture. He advises clients to bring their dress, accessories and makeup to the salon so he can engineer the perfect look.

Planners add 'insurance' to your party

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Consultants Cindy Himelstein (416-787-3156) and Heidi Gruenspan (905-738-5030) look upon their services as a type of insurance policy.

"When we're at a party, the family can be sure that things will run smoothly. They're able to enjoy themselves," says Himelstein.

She offers a full-service package as well as "day-of" services, she says, because many clients do their own planning but want someone at the wedding or bar/bat mitzvah.

"I speak to them on the phone several times throughout the planning process, visit the venue about one month before the event, and oversee the rehearsal.

"The day of the event, I come as early as they want, either to help the bride get dressed, or to assist with the photographs. I'm there for whatever they need."

Himelstein, who has a master's degree in social work, says it is important for clients to talk with her about their family dynamics.

"Some families have the challenge of dealing with divorced parents. They worry about walking down the aisle, taking pictures, and sitting at the head table.

"I try to speak to people individually and find out what would make them comfortable. I have experience dealing with uncomfortable situations, and I know how to listen," she says.

She also sees herself as a crisis manager. "If, for instance, 16 guests want to sit at one table, I have to be able to negotiate with them in a calm voice."

Gruenspan (www.heidig.ca), who offers one all-inclusive package, says it is important for her clients to get to know her well throughout the planning process, "so when I arrive at their party, we've built up a rapport. I'm not a stranger walking in."

She's there to deal with situations that the family of the bride or bar/bat mitzvah child should not have to worry about, she says.

"I've had dresses rip and ushers pass out, and once I even dealt with a bomb threat during the wedding speeches. I quietly took care of things without creating havoc, and no one knew about that except the parents," she says.

Both Gruenspan and Himelstein come to the event with a "Mary Poppins" bag full of supplies such as make-up, insoles, smelling salts, needle and thread, stain remover and bobby pins. "If someone needs something, chances are it's in the bag," Himelstein says.

Gruenspan is able to provide speech outlines for those for want one, help the bar/bat mitzvah write their speech or even take the bar/bat mitzvah parents shopping for give-aways. "I can be there for every step of the way; people should feel special during such a special occasion."

Party activities offer your guests something extra

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

These days, there's no shortage of party activities for kids and adults. These activities not only make your party more fun, they also provide many talented people with livelihoods and creative outlets. Here are two companies with ideas to liven up your special event.

Janice O'Bright of Party Extras (416-576-3506) left a successful ladies' accessories business to run Party Extras full time. As a mother of three, she knows what kids like – her son is almost 17 and her twin daughters are looking forward to their bat mitzvahs in August.

She started her business with crystal tattooing and airbrush body art. To these, she has added rainbow calligraphy, "dream themes," rice jewelry, "cool slides," mystic astrology and fortune telling, "partycatures," braiding and more.

In rainbow calligraphy, the letters of a name are shaped to look like brightly coloured tropical flora and fauna. Dream themes are trendy pillowcase designs geared to both boys and girls. With rice jewelry, names are written on grains of rice, which can be strung on a necklace or key chain. Cool slides are rubber band bracelets with slide-on letters to create names or sayings.

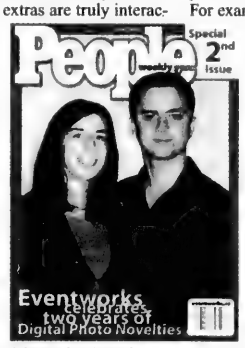
"I believe 100 per cent in networking," O'Bright says. "Sharing ideas within the industry and with clients. This makes my work more fun, and helps build my good name with other party professionals as well as the people we serve."

O'Bright enjoys introducing artistic activities to kids – give them something fun to do, and they'll do it, she says. And these party extras are truly interactive. They leave guests with a memento of the evening and supplement the entertainment offered by performers.

O'Bright says she will work with you and your budget, combining her ideas with yours. If you don't need something at your event, she won't push it. "Don't do it," she says.

Party Extras does long-term contracts as well as one-time events. They just finished a two-month airbrushing contract with Mirvish Productions for its Family Fridays theatre promotion, and they have a new contract with Mariposa Cruise Lines.

Ariel Platt of Eventworks (416-482-3984; www.eventworks.ca) is partners with designer Daniel Malen. Eventworks creates a variety of digital photo novelties: they take a photo and custom-design a border for it. For every party, they try to create something unique.



Eventworks is two years old, and Platt and Malen are full of enthusiasm for their work. Malen has just completed a joint York University-Sheridan College degree in design. Platt has a BA in fine arts and cultural studies from York and is finishing a master's degree.

One option that's popular with many hosts is to have guests' photos look as if they appeared on the cover of a magazine. For example, if your party has a sports theme, they could set the guests' photos in borders that look like the cover of Sports Illustrated.

Another option is to make customized photos of the guest of honour – say, the bar or bat mitzvah – as souvenirs of the event. Such a souvenir could have the date, location and other particulars, and possibly a brief message.

If you don't want a specific theme, you could ask for other patterns or colours, such as those which might match the invitations, the decor or the centrepiece. The only real limit is your imagination, Platt says.

Besides family celebrations, Eventworks does golf tournaments and other corporate events, using designs that may include your company logo.

This is fun for kids and adults alike. "It's also fun for my partner and me," says Platt. "Along with enjoying the outlet for visual creativity, we like working with people." If you visit Eventworks' Web site, you can see their work for yourself. If you book their services, your photos go up within a few days of your event, and stay up for the next few months.

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

Those organizing events celebrating the special moments in their lives or their children's are usually under stress and experience some tense moments.

But people look best in photographs when they're relaxed, so photographers must know how to put their subjects at ease.

Along with a good eye, artistic flair and technical skills, the ability to create a relaxed atmosphere is that "certain something" the best photographers have.

And photographers Elliot Sylman (905-889-0760) and Alex Himell of Platinum (905-709-7754) both have that certain something.

"I'm there to help people relax," Sylman says.

To that end, at no extra cost, he sets up a time before the big event to shoot some photographs of his clients.

Recently, he spent three hours doing engagement pictures of a couple, so when he arrived on the wedding day there were no awkward moments. "The bride came over immediately and gave me a hug." He adds: "I'm happy, I laugh, I try to lighten their day."

Sylman has a knack with children. Once he does the bar or bat mitzvah pictures of one child, the family asks him to return for the celebrations of their other children, he says. "With kids, I joke around and have fun."

Sylman says that professional photographers know what to do when problems arise on the wedding day. "I can deal with anything, even if it's not photography related. No one spends more time with the bride and the groom than the photographer."

Along with portraits and photograph albums, Sylman does digital albums, which are reasonably priced as part of a package. "Clients love them," he says. "If they want to send a digital album overseas, they can burn a copy for a few dollars. Only the first one is an expense, the rest are copies."

In keeping with his service philosophy, Sylman says if prospective clients aren't able to see him, he's happy to visit them and bring his laptop computer, where he stores 1,000 sample photographs.

When you hire a professional photographer, Himell says you can be confident you'll see the whole process of your special day and "you're guaranteed all the specific photographs you want."

Himell consults with his clients before their wedding day to get a feeling for the kind and style of shots they want. Most couples ask for a combination of traditional posed and more casual pictures. Some couples also request photographs of candid moments, such as pictures of the bride getting her hair done.

"In terms of location, some people like a city setting, being downtown or in Yorkville," Himell says. "We've even taken people to gas stations for some pictures." He adds that clients sometimes request shots in natural settings, in parks or north of the city.

Himell also provides digital albums as well portraits and photograph albums. He describes his shooting style as "casual elegance," with an element of fun.

Himell's clients have told him that everyone appears wonderfully relaxed in his photographs. "I create a comfortable atmosphere for clients to be in, even in portraits," he says.

Always book in advance when planning a holiday

By ERIN SILVER
Special to The CJN

Traveling can be fun – but only if you know where you're going and what you'll be doing.

If you need help planning your trip, whether it's a honeymoon, a wedding on the beach or a bar mitzvah, call the Summerhill Flight Centre (416-966-4333, www.flightcentre.ca), or for specialized Jewish heritage tours to Europe, call Intertours Travel (416-789-1291, www.intertours.ca). Experts at these centres can make your travel dreams come true.

"Even with conditions the way they are, there's such an attachment to Israel that I'm still sending people there to have bar mitzvahs," he says. "People still want to go and have this experience at a place of deep meaning."

Now more than ever, people are choosing to have their weddings at a resort.

"It's so popular because it's so easy," says Levine. "You get there and you're in paradise – you don't have to worry about anything. Resorts have wedding co-ordinators, videographers and even kosher catering." Group rates can be arranged for wedding parties.

Destinations such as Jamaica, Mexico and Panama are popular for honeymoons. The newest trend, however, is using the Flight Centre as a gift registry.

"Clients are registering with us so that their honeymoon is basically paid for."

No matter where you're going or why, Levine recommends booking early.

"You can never book early enough. There's a misconception that you can book last minute to get the best deal, but you will always save money if you book early."

If you wait for a last minute deal and there's no availability, Levine warns you could end up paying double the price.

You should also book early if you're planning on taking a Jewish heritage tour to Europe. Robert Holzberg has been leading tours around Europe for about two years and says the demand for his trips is increasing.

"It's something wonderful," says Holzberg. "We go to important sites in each city, we travel by deluxe coach and stay in first class accommodations," he says, adding that his unique trips depart at various times during the fall and spring months.

One trip takes participants to Prague, Vienna and Budapest while another one, introduced last year, visits Rome, Florence and Venice. A tour to Poland is in the works.

Tours are perfect for those between the ages of 40 and 75 and include kosher meals. Holzberg begins taking reservations three months in advance.

"We usually don't take more than 20 people at a time. It's an exclusive tour and we don't want to overcrowd them," he says – a policy that enables him to maintain top-notch service.

Get away from it all at these scenic party venues

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

If you want to provide your guests with that "getting away from it all" feeling, book your next simchah at Estates of Sunnybrook (416-440-2500) or Richmond Hill Country Club (905-731-2800).

Emma Young, club director at the newly renovated Richmond Hill Country Club, says the club has two banquet halls and several rooms which are perfect for more intimate gatherings.

"Our Georgian Room, which accommodates up to 300 guests, is lit with sparkling chandeliers, and is surrounded by floor to ceiling, wall to wall windows.

"The Regency room holds up to 150 guests, and like the Georgian Room, overlooks a gracious countryside in an exclusive country club setting."

Smaller parties can be held in the Library, Wellington or Richmond Rooms or in the "beautifully renovated Bistro with a poolside view and 150 guest capacity," she says.

Special features include fireplaces, free parking, and access to the country club spa and fitness facility.

A banquet hall at Estates of Sunnybrook.

Young says the staff at Richmond Hill is always there to help plan parties "every step of the way, from hiring professionals such as musicians and florists, to decorating the rooms."

Kirk Brady, managing director of the Estates of Sunnybrook, says the estates, comprised of Vaughan Estate and McLean House, have been playing hosts to weddings and other affairs for almost 75 years.

For weddings especially, "there is a team dedicated to making sure that everything is exactly how you want it to be. Every wedding held at either McLean House or Vaughan Estate, reflects our commitment to helping you create the wedding of your dreams," he says.

Once the family has contacted the Estates, and has settled on the number of guests and style of reception, he says, "we suggest the ideal venue from among the many rooms available.

The wedding arbour at Vaughan Estate and the garden behind McLean House are two of the more popular options for outdoor services", he says, "and during the cooler months, there is a choice of of indoor rooms available."

For those who want to be sure every detail is attended to, he says, "the wedding team helps craft your ceremony and reception to the most exacting of standards.

"From table linens and cutlery choices, to making sure that anyone in your party with special needs is accommodated, to providing the bride and bridesmaid with a private, comfortable changing area that includes space for a hair stylist, makeup artist and the bridal party – we take care of everything."

Staff can also assist in additional services required for the wedding, "such as a florist familiar with the Estates, or a disc jockey who understands the particular acoustic quirks of McLean House and Vaughan Estate," he says.

All revenues generated by the Estates contribute to scientific advances and research projects undertaken at Sunnybrook and Women's College Health Sciences Centre.

Outdoor party places: everything from herb gardens to go-karts

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Now that the weather's finally warming up, it's time to put on lighter clothes and look for outdoor fun.

Here are two locations that offer lots to do, whether it's for a weekend with the family or a venue for a party.

Vijay Tailor of Black Creek Pioneer Village (416-736-1733) promotes this venue as the place to see how people lived between the mid-1800s and the 1870s – an era when most daily work was still done by hand, the telegraph was the fastest means of communication and the railway was the only means of transport faster than a horse.

At the workshops and stores in the village, interpreters in period clothing demonstrate the work of the various tradespeople: the tinsmith, the blacksmith, the harness maker, the cabinet maker and the cooper (who made barrels). Guests can take part in some activities.

At the village's print shop, you'll see how old lead type was set and a newspaper printed. In those days, a small-town paper came out every two weeks or so; it took that long to gather in the news from the countryside and then to put the paper together.

Pioneer Village also has a farm, where guests can see how crops and stock were raised in the days before most farmers had much machinery. There's an herb garden to show what herbal medicines were grown before drugs were manufactured.

The village has hosted plenty of bar and bat mitzvahs, as well as other functions. The outdoor patio is fully licensed and equipped, with a big tent, furniture, linen, power and water supply. There is catering on site; the menu includes a barbecue that can be adapted to kids' tastes.

There are indoor rooms as well. In the Halfway House Inn, the freshly baked bread has become a favourite, and the restaurant menu there recreates meals of the 1870s.

For seven weekends from July 5 to August 24, with the help of seed money from the Ontario Cultural Attractions Fund, Pioneer Village will host a music festival called Sensational Sounds of Summer.

Each weekend will feature a different theme with dancing and costumes. The themes include Celtic, aboriginal, Caribbean, European and Canadian folk music. And the weekend of the re-enactment of the American Civil War recreates the music of the times.

Funstation Fun Park (416-736-4804; www.funstationfunpark.com) in North York is owned by Michele Upton and her husband, who refurbished a decrepit amusement park and made it into a venue with a railway theme that has plenty of outdoor activities. The couple have many plans to increase the park's appeal for everyone from seniors to toddlers.

Funstation is a spacious, beautifully landscaped five-acre park with plenty of mature trees. You'll find it on York Gate Boulevard, two blocks from Highway 400 north of Finch. Upton sees it as a place where you can "get away from it all" without going too far from the city.

Funstation's activities include two 18-hole miniature golf courses, which the Uptons have renovated and landscaped. You can play at night, too, with gentle music piped in.

The owners of Funstation also know it is the season to think about baseball. While you don't find many places around Toronto with even one batting cage, Funstation Fun Park has three, and they supply bats and helmets.

The park also has an arcade, air hockey and fooseball (like soccer, but with four players to a side). Its Go-Kart speedway is a challenge to kids' navigation skills, with plenty of hairpin turns. There's an easier track too for younger kids, and the Uptons are considering a simple oval track for two- or three-year-olds. The park supplies helmets and hairnets.

You can eat at Funstation as well. Along with the refreshment stands you'd expect to see in an amusement park, there's the Station Bar & Grill, with a spacious patio where you can relax.

Everything you need for good summer fun is at Funstation. The park hosts many group functions, ranging from birthdays to corporate events and fundraisers. They can section off an area for your party. And you can add them to your list of places to take the kids on a weekend or holiday.

Upton agrees with what a lot of parents and teachers are now realizing: kids don't really want to sit in front of a computer all day. All you have to do is offer them some outlet for the energy sitting inside them, waiting to go kinetic.

Other party places advertising in this supplement are: Annie's Art House, 416-781-7767; Beadology, 905-709-6562; Keri's Dancin' Kids (KDK), 905-731-5146.

Mandell Xtreme opens up new party venue

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Mandell Xtreme's (416-923-7200) third event facility, The Lobby, is set to open on the ground floor of its offices at Bloor Street and Avenue Road.

"In New York or Los Angeles, that is the hottest place to be. There are always events going on in a hotel lobby.

"We've designed our new venue to resemble a lobby, right down to the elevator door," says Florence, whose company, Entertainment Xtreme, recently joined forces with Cory Mandell's Mandell Entertainment Group.

As with their other two venues – the York Event Theatre at Yonge Street and Eglinton Avenue, and the Capitol Theatre just down the street – the Mandell Xtreme team can put together a client's whole event, says Florence.

"Clients notice a recognizable difference when they deal with a firm the size of ours. There is a structure of people in charge so there is back-up, back-up and more back-up.

"With five full-time fully trained sales reps, there is always someone on hand to speak to, and when clients call they don't get lost in voice mail."

The venues lend themselves to any type of event, and with Mandell Xtreme, each party is unique, he says.

"A lot of kids go to bar or bat mitzvah parties every week, and we want ours to be different, from the initial introduction, right down to the entertainment. We don't want to give people a cookie-cutter party."

When people walk into the company's warehouse, they can choose from a huge array of products to entertain their guests, he says.

"Popular now is lenticular photo imaging, in which two digital pictures of the party guests are combined to create a three-dimensional effect,"he says. "We take their pictures and then create fake ID cards, such as official back-seat driver's license, or best friends forever card."

Clients can also make use of Mandell Xtreme's Prop Factory, which specializes in television, theatre and movie sets.

"We recycle the props into the event industry so we can do such things as convert a ballroom into a jungle, complete with elephants, tigers, trees and vines."

Corey Mandell invites you to The Lobby.

"We travel to summer camps across Ontario and put on a social for the campers complete with music, lights and prizes. The kids love it; it is something outside the realm of their day-to-day activities and it is totally exciting for them."

Some of the camps start off with an all-day program, and have the party as a finale at night.

"It adds something to their camp experience."

"I had worked for Mandell, and then left to form my own company. Since being back, I can't believe how much the company has grown. I was the competitor, but Mandell was always one step ahead. You never knew what he would come up with next."

It's time for dessert and drinks

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

There's no end to the human ability to concoct delectable foods and drinks. Here are examples of one each: chocolate to eat, and wine to drink.

There's virtually no shape that can't be reproduced in chocolate, says Bob Levine, owner of Chocolate Charm (416-787-4256), who has elevated chocolate to an art form.

Chocolate Charm's specialty is an all-chocolate smash cake made with fine Belgian dark, Swiss milk or Swiss white chocolate. On the standard rectangular base, they will put any shape you choose. They've done animals, sports equipment, computers and cars.

Every cake is customized, so give some thought to what styles, shapes and colours you want. Chocolate Charm recommends booking a few months ahead. When you order a shape, they do a search among companies that make moulds, and some moulds take longer to find than others.

Chocolate Charm also makes truffles and small treats such as chocolate lollipops. And their chocolate swans and cornucopia-shaped baskets, which are filled with goodies, can be placed on sweet tables or sent as gifts.

Chocolate Charm is kosher under COR.

Looking for something to sip with guests in your backyard on a pleasant afternoon? Frances Ratcliffe, a product consultant for the LCBO, recommends coolers. "Casual coolers are always hot during summer," she says.

The earliest coolers were wine-based, but now there are coolers based on spirits as well.

One of the many new coolers is like rye and ginger in a bottle, based on Canadian Club. A sweeter variety is from vodka mixed with blueberry and pink-grapefruit juice. Pure Spring is less sweet and made with carbonated spring water and vodka. Smirnoff Ice contains higher-quality Triple Black vodka and citrus juices. These come in packs of four.

Customized cakes from Chocolate Charm.

Seagram's offers two new coolers. One, called Black, is cherry flavoured, made with clear sparkling vodka. Its partner, called White, is clear and softly fizzing, with a bit of citrus pulp. These also come in packs of four.

There are two tropical Tabu rum coolers, each in a single 500-millilitre bottle. Forbidden Fruit comes in a manly-looking Bacardi bottle. It is pineapple- flavoured, and not too sweet or too dry. Tropical Orange Smoothie tastes like a Creamsicle.

If you like beer, try Sleemans Cream Ale in a five-litre keg or Molson's Bubba keg. Stella Artois beer is fresh, crisp and lively, and goes with all kinds of food. Then there's Barveria from Brazil, with a very light hops taste and not at all bitter.

Jacqueline Corrigan is a product consultant for the Liquor Control Board of Ontario. The LCBO stores vary somewhat in the range of kosher wines they offer; so for detailed information, she advises you to call the board's Infoline at 416-365-5900. An officer there will be able to tell you whether a product is kosher, and under which certification.

Also, Corrigan urges you to call or visit your local store, and look their shelves over. And she refers to two Web sites: www.lcbo.com to search for products whose names you already know; and www.vintages.com for the LCBO's monthly release of new wines.

Traditionally, kosher wine meant sweet; but those days are long gone. The range of kosher vintages now available, from Israel and every wine growing region in the world, is truly vast. The products mentioned here are a small sample.

Rather than simply list vintages, Corrigan offers some suggestions on what goes with what. Match the weight of the wine to the weight of the dishes served, she advises.

But it's not just a question of matching the wine with a particular food, as in the old adage "red wines with red meat, white with fish or poultry." Take into consideration the size of the repast, and the style in which it is served.

Fish, for example, which has more fat content than red meat, generally goes best with a wine of some acidity, say a Sauvignon blanc or a Riesling. Sole, in turn, needs a lighter wine than salmon, because salmon is heavier and more dense.

For roast beef, or the kind of traditional fare associated with weddings, a Cabernet Sauvignon Fortant de France is good, or an aged Bordeaux. Veal, however, which is a lighter red meat, is best with a Merlot or Beaujolais, which doesn't have a lot of tannins.

For light backyard fare on a summer afternoon, a lighter wine is the best match — say, a Pino Grigio. For poultry, a Sauvignon blanc is good, with a slight lemony or citrus flavour.

Garden Party held today

Partygoers don't have to feel self-conscious about their attire or worry about wandering around with cocktails making small talk. It doesn't matter where you sit or stand, there is no hierarchy and cliques are discouraged from huddling in corners.

The fresh air and sunshine or stars — depending on time of day or evening — form the perfect backdrop. Usually, flowers and trees enhance the scene, as does the aroma of delectable refreshments emanating from the outdoor barbeque or the chef's kitchen quarters.

Unfortunately, Mother Nature has her ups and downs and rain or chilly breezes are apt to prevail. Therefore, a tent, a covered balcony or an indoor contingency plan must be in place.

Nevertheless, many simchahs and other functions can be enjoyed at an outdoor party. Whether it's an engagement party or a toddler's second birthday, the garden lends itself to the occasion.

- Order simple but comfortable garden chairs and tables.
- Buy plenty of sturdy, water-resistant paper plates, napkins, plastic cutlery, drinking cups and serving pieces.
- Everything you serve should be kept covered and in the fridge or oven until just before serving time. It's so easy for food to be spoiled in hot weather.
- Food must be thoroughly cooked, especially fish, poultry and beef.
- Make sure you have enough barbecue burners; otherwise people will have to wait too long for food.
- Have a variety, so that everyone is happy, whether they are vegetarians or meat and potato eaters.
- Desserts can be fun to prepare and simplified during the summer. Fruit is in full season and nothing is more refreshing and healthy than fresh fruit.
- Squares and cookies can be prepared ahead and don't involve a lot of cutlery and plates, making them perfect for summer entertaining.

Registries: good for guests and hosts alike

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

For good reasons, registries have become the usual way for wedding guests to give the bride and groom china, linens and a wide range of other gifts.

The extremes of gift-giving are handcrafted objects, which are the most personal, and money, which is the least so. Each kind of gift has its place, but for most of the guests at a wedding, neither will do. A handmade present requires talent, time and effort to do well, and must be something the recipient will cherish. Only if it meets all these requirements is it ideal.

Bedroom linen from Canalite Linens.

Money simplifies matters if you don't know the couple well, or don't know what they want. But for most people money feels too abstract. The bride and groom are more likely to remember you by something tangible.

Registries allow guests to buy something the couple wants and prevents duplication. The bride and groom choose the items and patterns the guests are to buy, and what is bought is recorded, so that every guest who uses the registry spends money on something that hasn't yet been purchased.

As far as products go, Rozsi Goodman of Goodman's China & Gift Store Ltd. (905-731-3564; www.goodmanschina.com), and David Yiu of Canalite Linens Superstore (905-886-2370) are in different businesses. Each, however, offers customers the advantages of a gift registry.

Select a registry with a high standard of service, Goodman advises. They will offer the best selection of gifts at prices to suit any budget and offer extras such as wrapping and prompt delivery.

Goodman, who has been in business for 34 years, urges people planning a wedding to choose a registry with a good, long track record. So does Yiu, who has been in business since 1988. A family store is best, where the owners take a personal interest in pleasing their clients, and staff are knowledgeable and helpful.

Look for a notification service as thorough as the one Goodman's offers. The bridal couple receive up-to-date notices in the mail, saying who bought what. The gift-buyer has the option of walking out with the present and taking it to the party, or having it delivered free to the bride and groom's new home.

At Goodman's, items can also be exchanged. If the bridal couple change their minds about what they want, money spent on one pattern or item can be applied toward something else.

This option is also useful if someone buys something from the store, but as sometimes happens, doesn't register it. And Goodman's will also let the bride and groom know if a pattern goes on special or is discontinued.

Also at Goodman's, brides and grooms stay in the system after the wedding, so they can alter their choices in the future. This is helpful if, for example, they get only two place settings in a pattern that turns out to be too expensive for them to buy more or is discontinued, or if, after choosing one pattern, they see another they like better.

Yiu warns brides and grooms to make sure they use a registry that holds all the goods for them until the wedding shower. Not every registry does so. Canalite will hold all the items on deposit and they also print out a list the couple can give their friends and relatives.

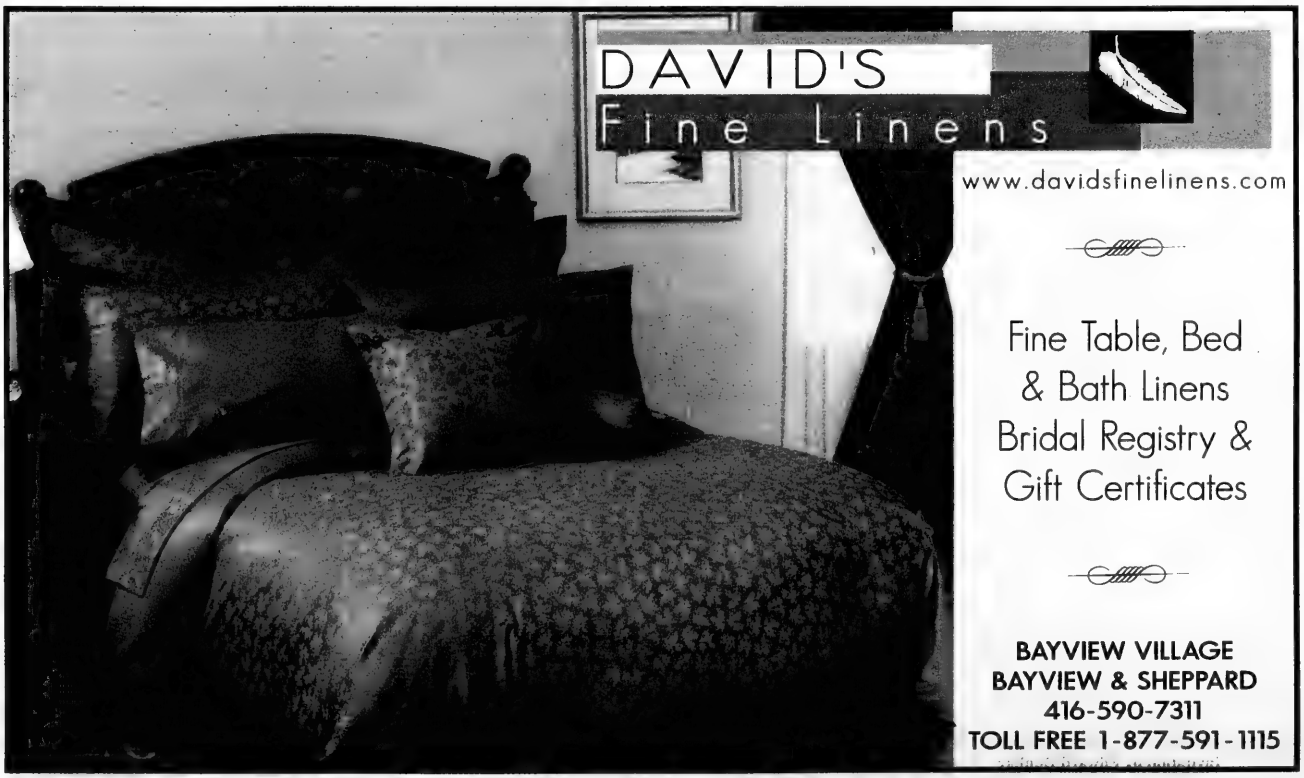
Also, says Yiu, guests shouldn't have to come to the store; they should be able to order by phone and credit card. This is especially important for out-of-town guests.

Dinnerware from Goodman's China .

Yiu says customers can't order Canalite stock online yet. He belives the Internet can't replace the firsthand experience of coming in, not just to see bedding and bathroom accessories, but to feel them: they're curious about the couple's tastes.

While Yiu estimates that about 90 per cent of his customers are women, he says they often bring their fiancés in. Even if the man doesn't come to the store, the fiancée can show him a pattern sampler. Having both spouses decide on items and prices, he says, makes for more domestic harmony.

Registering early helps avoid a last-minute rush. Goodman recommends choosing your registry soon after your engagement, and four to six weeks before the first major entertainment when guests will bring gifts. Most customers register three to four months ahead, says Yiu. While this is good, earlier is better.



Great invitations key to great first impression

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Making a stellar first impression is the key to many things in life and parties are no exception.

That's why a dazzling invitation, the prelude to a party, should make your guests excited to come to the affair.

"An invitation should set the tone for the event," says invitation creator Heather Hennick of Partyzazz (www.partyzazz.com or 905-881-5736).

Hennick says simple elegance is the trend for invitations these days, with many party hosts opting for eye-catching, but not ostentatious designs.

"You wouldn't send a black and white invitation for a country wedding. You'd send something that's fun and full of colours," she says.

"For a formal affair, the card can be interactive, like having a tie to undo, so it's got a presentation to it."

She advises people to keep invitations compact and convenient.

"It's nice to have a contained invitation so you don't have pieces of paper flying everywhere," she says.

"So the invitation would have everything attached, [like] a pouch for the reply and an insert for maps."

One of the invitations she created was a compact design that folds up into a square, making its own envelope.

Moskaluk-Rutkay says there are some unwritten rules when sending invitations. For instance, they should be sent out six to eight weeks prior to the affair.

As well, she adds, "Thank you cards don't have to be elaborate, just as long as they are sent."

Both Partyzazz and Invitations by Design offer invitations with Hebrew print in addition to other languages.

Clients can also select a particular design from a book or have an invitation tailor-made for their party.

The style of writing on the invitation is another consideration.

"A company that offers calligraphy services will save a person a lot of time to do great addressing," Hennick says.

Price is always a concern. Hennick says people can save money by selecting the right size invitation.

"All my cards are standard size so the client doesn't have to pay extra postage," Hennick says.

Another way to save a few dollars is by selecting a standard colour of ink, she says.

"Fancy colours will add to the cost and may not be necessary if you have a good design to begin with."

Keeping your guests occupied

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

Whether it be a wedding or bar/bat mitzvah, planning events can be extremely time-consuming and stressful.

While you are busy running from your suit fitting to the caterer, you have no time left to entertain your out-of-town guests.

Judy Holland to the rescue! As a partner with Irina Nagel and IIT Tours (905-731-7305), Holland offers a fun and unique way of keeping your guests occupied.

> Her clients love the tours because they are safe

The company arranges customized tours of Toronto and surrounding areas. If time permits, the trips can venture as far as Ottawa and Montreal.

Tours can include Toronto sightseeing, Harbourfront tours, shopping excursions, Niagara Falls, winery tours, helicopter rides and even historical tours of old Jewish neighbourhoods.

Holland works closely with each client so that the tours coincide perfectly with schedules and budgets.

The guided trips are available in English, Hebrew, Spanish, Russian, German and Hungarian. As well, the trips include personal pick up and delivery.

Holland has been a professional tour guide for the past 10 years. She recently realized that personalized trips were neglected in the industry, something she soon changed.

Her clients love the tours because they are safe. And her senior clients are surprised at what is available in our fun- filled city.

IIT Tours are informative and entertaining. They appeal to everyone because they completely adjust to each client's needs.

Magic by Jordan will let you be a child again

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Once you've been a child, part of you always is. Inside each serious adult, that child is waiting for a chance to come out and play. For the child in you, the world is still fresh, and every event is a miracle. And for an adult, magic can still call forth that sense of wonder.

Jordan Rosencwajg of Magic By Jordan (905-674-8835) is 18 years old. He has been doing magic since he was five, when he was entranced by the magicians at Harbourfront. Soon after, he saw the movie David Copperfield. He was amazed, and wanted to recreate that feeling for others.

In 1997, Rosencwajg began putting on small shows for family and friends. At age 14, he worked for Browser's Den of Magic at Canada's Wonderland; and in 1998, he went into business on his own, starting with kids' birthday parties.

Now, as he's gaining a larger clientele, he's doing bar and bat mitzvahs, corporate work and shows at summer camps.

Rosencwajg enjoys the intimacy of a small party the most. There he can interact personally with each guest. Looking out from a stage over the heads of 500 people just isn't the same.

On stage, he explains, magic isn't as magical. The audience doesn't expect to see how the illusion is created. They think the distance is part of what makes a trick work.

"Magic is more amazing close-up because you think you should be able to see through it and figure it out, but you can't. And it's more fun for me, because I see that look of amazement and wonder on every face," he says.

Rosencwajg is candid about what magic does for him personally. People tell him he's more fun and relaxed while he performs. "It helps me interact with other people," he says. "Maybe it can do this for kids too."

Sponge balls are among his favourite items to work with. He tosses them back and forth in his hands, making one ball multiply into two or three. Then he hands you one, and suddenly it's two.

Another interesting device is a tiny guillotine about five or six inches long. You are allowed to examine the blade and feel its weight. Then you place your fingers under it and Rosencwajg presses it down. Just when you think the blade has passed through your fingers, they're still there, untouched.

In Rosencwajg's experience, adults like magic as much as kids do. Adults cherish the opportunity to go back to being children. They soon let their veneer of grown-up sophistication slip away.

Some bar mitzvah kids, in contrast, want to prove that they're wise to everything. They try to grab his props and call out that they know the tricks, even though they don't.

Rosencwajg doesn't want magic to be his full-time job. It's more fun as a something to do once or twice a week. He is also a film student at university.

He has made a small tie-in between film and magic. "Traditionally, they tell you to practice in front of a mirror. That way, though, you spend too much time looking at your reflection. When you see yourself on film, you concentrate more on your performance. You see yourself from the viewpoint of the audience."

A beautiful party dress is like a work of art

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Every store can sell a dress, but to fit it perfectly is an art, say Joe Nourani, owner of Edith's Fashions and Jodi Weisleder of Jodi International Limited.

At Edith's, (416-633-4222) which has over 8,000 square feet of dresses and suits for party guests, and mothers of the bride, groom or bar/bat mitzvah, "the staff is trained to know what makes a woman look good."

Despite the huge amount of inventory, Nourani says that when a woman comes into the store, one of the 11 staff members can show her three dresses that will suit the woman and the occasion.

"Our staff knows who should wear what, and we tell our customers if something does not look right. We can always sell a dress to a woman once, but what about the second time? We have to make sure women walk out of our store with the right garment."

Edith's has a collection of items from Europe – they travel to Milan, Paris, Germany or Manchester at least five times a year – and from the New York fashion shows, says Nourani.

"To come into our store is like sitting on a plane and travelling from fashion capital to fashion capital. They can visit every place and pick the cream of the crop."

Edith's seven full-time seamstresses can then fit and finish the garment until it is perfect, he says.

'To make it fit, you have to be a Picasso.'

"Fitting an outfit is more difficult than making it in the first place. To make it fit, you have to be a Picasso."

Wedding and bar mitzvah guests are still choosing floor or ankle length dresses, he says, and the important colours are black, navy or grey.

"If they plan to wear an outfit again, it is better to choose neutral colours because those colours do not stand out. It won't register that they are wearing the same dress."

If a woman wants to wear the same suit again, seamstresses at Edith's can change the buttons in order to give it new detail, he says.

"We want our customers to be able to recycle their clothing. Women don't want to buy five or six suits."

Jodi Weisleder of Jodi International Limited (416-785-7270), a designer clothing company that manufactures women's day/evening suits, dresses and separates, says that wearing the right clothing gives a woman high self-esteem.

"Clothing is the first thing that people look at, and if a woman is dressed appropriately for an occasion, she is taken seriously."

One of her trademarks, she says, is to "take a suit and give it a little bit of glamour and sex appeal. I elevate the suit and give it a personality, but not so that it screams at you."

Her J by Jodi line is a sportier line that is geared to the 14 to 22-year-old. "This collection has blouses and skirts that have an added twist such as ruffles or funky buttons. It adds some novelty to the outfit.

"Girls want to have their own clothes, not a version of their mothers' outfits. I design this line to be sometimes elegant and sophisticated, and sometimes adventurous and trendy. I want to make it fun for them."

For women's eveningwear, she has made liberal use of crystals and beads, says Weisleder, "and we've added lustrous pearls in shades of cream, grey or pink.

"Lace, grosgrain and ribbons are the highlight of the collection, and its signature look. Very popular is the ivory pearl embroidered suit, which has a timeless elegance."

Her message this season is "do it like a lady", she says, and the collection is brimming with soft feminine shapes and retro tailoring details.

She takes great care in choosing fabrics, she says, and she sources all her textiles, trimmings and novelites from mills in Italy, France, Switzerland and Asia. As well, many fabrics are custom made for her.

Taking kosher standards to new heights

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

George Friedmann dispelled the myth that kosher food can't be delicious when he opened Royal Kosher Catering.

Friedmann owns Toronto's Windsor Arms Hotel and he knows good food, so it's not surprising that Royal Kosher Catering (416-971-9666) has managed to take the standards for kosher food to new heights in this city.

The Windsor Arms' restaurant, the Courtyard Café, regularly receives five-star reviews from local and international critics for its delicious food and excellent service. Using the same kitchen staff, Royal Kosher offers the same calibre of food preparation and presentation.

The company can prepare a traditional Sephardi spread, or go wildly modern, with dazzling visual displays that rival contemporary paintings. The broad range of options in between is only limited by the imagination. The bottom line, Friedmann says, is always quality and impact.

Royal Kosher Caterers operates mainly out of the kitchen of Sephardic Kehila Centre at Bathurst and Steeles and occasionally uses the kitchen of The Village Shul on Eglinton West. It caters to any location, whether it be a synagogue, a private home or the Art Gallery of Ontario.

Friedmann founded Royal Kosher Catering after the Windsor Arms had disappointing experiences with two Toronto kosher caterers in 1999.

One of the caterers, he says, "did an absolutely horrible job." A few weeks later, he tried another one but the results weren't much better.

Friedmann says many Toronto kosher caterers use religious requirements as an excuse for preparing food that is neither tasty nor well-presented. The best cuts of meat are kosher, Friedmann points out, and baking without dairy can be problematic but it's possible to create some exquisite dairy-free desserts.

"One shouldn't have to compromise what one eats or drinks just because one has certain religious beliefs," he says.

Many people who are not kosher in their everyday lives but would like kosher food on special occasions end up foregoing it, he says.

"We had one function where someone was convinced that the food couldn't be kosher because it was so good."

He's critical of Toronto kosher caterers who use cooks instead of chefs to staff their kitchens.

"If you use cooks to cook the product and put it on a plate, then you get what you pay for," he says.

Friedmann says Toronto's kosher caterers ought to compete in high culinary style, without gouging it just because the food is kosher.

Caricatures make a great party souvenir

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

While pleasant memories from a party can remain in our minds for years, it's also nice to take home a physical memento, especially one that's funny.

Caricaturist Mark Ciale (416-203-2514) says party guests with a portrait-like sketch of themselves engaged in a fun activity are taking home a long-lasting memento that others can enjoy.

"Friends gather around [when I draw] it, people laugh and it's a fun souvenir to take home," says Ciale.

"I run into people and they say, 'You did my caricature six years ago and I still have it framed at home.'"

Ciale says some partygoers may be shy and having a caricaturist on hand acts as an "ice-breaker." He usually starts doing the drawings, which take roughly three minutes, while the initial cocktails are being served.

Caricaturist Brian Montenegro (416-533-1809) says his illustrations are "a cross between a cartoon and portrait, with the big head and small body." While there is a slight exaggeration, "it still looks like them."

Montenegro allows guests to select the type of action or hobby they want portrayed in the caricature.

"If it's a boy who likes hockey, I may draw them with a stick and puck and a little girl (cheering) in the stands," Montenegro says.

While there is usually some humour to the picture, Montenegro prefers to keep the joke element "subtle."

"I tend to try to be complimentary," he says. "It really comes down to getting a good likeness."

Montenegro and Ciale encourage clients to ask for references from other people who have had a caricaturist work at their affair.

"Ask for samples, either from a Web site or hard copy," Ciale says. "Decide if it's the style you like and if it's appropriate to your party."

Ciale says kids tend to like caricatures that are "loose and funny," but he will check with them to see what style they are looking for.

Montenegro says themes such as the hillbilly look go in and out of style, but right now there aren't any specific trends.

At one party, he created five different caricatures of the bar mitzvah boy that were drawn onto the sign-in board. At another affair, all of the caricatures were done on pillowcases.

"It's really what they want [as a reflection] of their own taste," Montenegro says.

Let the party planner help arrange your simchah

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Partners Karen Garscadden and Karen Jacobs of Up & Coming Events Inc. (905-886-8148; www.upandcoming events.ca), and Dana Zita of aNd Logistix (416-593-7744; www.andlogistix.com) have unique approaches to their work. But both companies offer high standards and the advantages of having professionals plan your party.

"Let us do the shlepping," Zita says

"You could do it yourself," Garscadden admits, "but do you really want to?"

Better to benefit from the experience of someone who knows the ropes.

The planner only does as much as you delegate, Garscadden adds. If you want to do part of the work yourself, you can.

Garscadden and Jacobs have been partners at Up & Coming Events for 15 years, working on every kind of social and corporate celebration. Most of their work is repeat business. And they've earned the acclaim of their peers; in 2002, they received the Canadian Event Industry Award for the best wedding.

Zita also does party planning for every kind of event. She and her partner Beatriz Leonardo are continually learning and upgrading skills. Zita is a certified Special Events Professional, Leonardo a certified Meeting Professional.

Zita and Garscadden both use only the best venues and suppliers. And knowing which are the best is easier for a professional than it would be for us. Garscadden says it's an ongoing task. New entertainers, themes and activities are always appearing on the scene.

Garscadden also stresses the importance of good organization. This means seeing to details we might miss, like getting copies of the speeches. It also means dealing with unexpected problems – preferably with such finesse that we don't even know there's a problem until after it's solved.

Garscadden recounts how, at one bar mitzvah, speeches ran so far overtime that the kids had to leave in a hurry because a bus was waiting to take them to the pickup spot for their parents. Would the evening be spoiled? What to do?

Garscadden quietly organized rapid deployment of loot bags to the bus. Then she organized a conga line with music, and led the kids dancing out the door. On the bus, they found loot bags waiting. What could have been a disappointment was transformed into a pleasant surprise.

aNd Logistix has been in business 9½ years, first near King and Spadina, now in Little Italy. It's a good neighbourhood; lower rent enabled them to expand their staff and they're still close to downtown, but also now to the 401, so it's easier to keep in touch with clients and suppliers.

"We have as many suppliers in the northern part of the city," Zita says.

Garscadden recommends booking as much as two years ahead, the sooner, the better. And, she urges, choose someone who will help make your event reflect your personal style.

"At my first meeting with a client," she says, "I ask more questions than she asks me. I have to get to know her."

Rapport and confidence between planner and client are essential. "Because a planner is neutral to family politics," Garscadden observes, "she may be easier to talk to than a family member."

Garscadden takes the adage about "going the extra mile" one step further. A few days after the event, when you may be suffering from the letdown known as post-party depression, she calls to see how you're doing.

aNd Logistix has a lot of experience with corporate events and non-profit organizations. Recently, they did the high-profile Juvenile Diabetes Research Foundation gala, held every two years, where the entertainment featured singer Tony Bennett.

"We enjoy non-profit work," Zita says, "and we offer lower rates for it. We put in extra time and we try to get suppliers on board, with items at cost or donated."

They can do this because their high-volume corporate work lets them benefit from economies of scale, which may mean substantial discounts. If you're planning a family event such as a bat mitzvah, they can pass these savings on to you.

At aNd Logistix fees are itemized, so that you always know how much you're paying and for what. You see not only how much you spend, but also how much you save. Corporate clients, with their eye on the bottom line, love this.

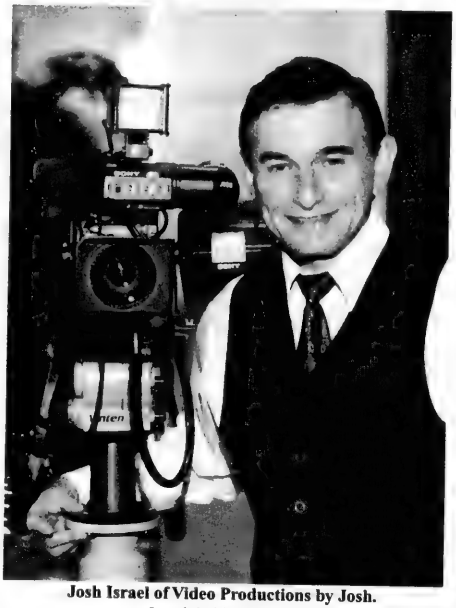
Planning a party? Don't forget the videographer

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN



Josh Israel of Video Productions by Josh.

You fuss over invitations, organize seat arrangements and the caterer's menu and finalize the DJ's song list. Inevitably, the videographer is last on your mind as you plan your party.

"That is a recipe for disaster," warns Josh Israel, who runs Video Productions by Josh (905-709-9277). The videographer has heard many stories of people ignoring the importance of videotaping their event. Later they regret not having put enough money and thought into how the party would develop on tape.

Israel says clients should look for a reputable videographer, and get references. "Call and ask these former customers about the quality of the video," he says. "You don't want to end up with an unusable product."

Israel assures his clients he uses the high-end cameras his competitors avoid (his camera and lens combined cost $50,000). He also brings along "lights, tripods and microphones a step above what the cheapie guys are using," he says.

But since you spend thousands on DJs, food and hall rental, shouldn't the videographer be light on the wallet?

"In this business, you pay for what you get," Israel sums up. "If the cost is lower than $1,200, that's thrown-out money."

He says many clients aren't aware of the costs of taping a party, especially when videographers dedicate their capital to buying top-notch equipment. Air-pressurized tripods – "shaky shoulders equals shaky cameras" – and cordless transmitor mikes add to professional credibility.

Giving clients options of a DVD or VHS recording, Israel charges $1,500 to $2,000 for a bar mitzvah or wedding. But he finds more clients interested in his hourly rate – $100 per hour of videotape. That package is more attractive to those planning small weddings or bar mitzvah luncheons.

With the DVD option, Israel can toy around with graphics and editing features. One trick, he says, is to edit a dance session by wrapping the image in a box, and then open the box to the next scene. Special effects like that, Israel says, make customers call him and exclaim, "That DVD was unbelieveable!"

He stresses how important the video experience can be, after the fact. "The event goes by so fast, the organizer is deluged by guests and friends and alcohol, that the video becomes the memento. But it becomes the biggest investment in the end because it brings the party back to life."

Israel, in his 25th year in the field, advises party-planners to find a videographer who is both personable and professional. For example, during the obligatory table-to-table interviews, Israel will "gently twist an arm" if someone isn't too forthcoming. A videographer should be kind and gregarious, but not so much that he pressures relatives to speak on camera.

"And if he's organized, the videographer will be following the schedule so there's no surprises," he says.

Clients should also be aware of lead time. Videographers' schedules fill up quickly, and Israel suggests booking at least a year in advance.

"If you hold until a couple months before the party," he says, "you're getting new guys with less experience because the most popular ones are very busy."

Are there events where people need not worry about hiring a professional to videotape?

"At small parties in basements or restaurants, say 75 people… a normal home camera will do the job fine."

Israel adds a quick "But."

"If the event is important to the client, then it's important to keep that memory for the future."

Transform the humdrum into the ultimate fantasy

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

Richard Winkler and his team can transform a boring, humdrum room into the party room of a child's dreams.

A specialist in bar and bat mitzvah décor, Winkler of Happy Days (416-789-4438) creates party environments based on themes – drama, sports, music or whatever else may fascinate a child. He recently did two party themes based on the television show Survivor.

Winkler and his team, which includes his sister-in-law Marsha Winkler and 30 part-timers, work much of their magic with balloon decor, including balloon sculptures such as arches and trees.

"Balloons enhance the room," he says. "When you walk into the room, it gives you a good feeling inside."

Winkler's consultation process includes visiting the party room before the event, then describing to his prospective clients how it can be transformed into the room they envision.

"We guide them through the process," he says, adding that the service is offered without obligation.

Party organizers are invited to drop by the Happy Days showroom in the Toys 'R Us Plaza at Yonge and Steeles for coffee and a look at samples and photographs.

Happy Days' décor service includes the set-up for candlelighting, centrepieces, sign-in boards and lighted name boards.

The sign-in board, reflecting the party's theme, incorporates the guest-of-honour's photograph. Guests sign the three-foot-high board when they arrive and afterward, the board becomes a keepsake for the family.

A lighted name board for a party with a music theme might be inscribed with music notes as well as the guest of honour's name. The five-foot-high board, with lights behind it, is placed behind the head table.

For dessert time, Happy Days offers a complete range of party machines, including cotton candy, Sno Kone, mini doughnut and mini pretzel machines, as well as popcorn carts. A staff member comes to dispense the kosher treats.

"Our machines are enjoyed not just by the kids," Winkler says. "Adults enjoy them, too."

The guest of honour uses a specially provided hammer to smash the cake, then the other kids attack it. "It's a fun thing," he says.

Winkler says his prices are reasonable and he always comes in within budget. Depending on the complexity of a job, it can take up to a day to decorate a room.

Kids enjoy the novelty items used as party giveaways, especially the buttons that light up and the necklaces that glow.

These items serve a purpose at a party beyond their obvious value as loot. They are the prizes used in the contests and games that help kids interact.

Glow necklace is all-time favourite party giveaway

Dominion Smallwares (416-665-9526) has a vast selection of novelty items, including light-up buttons, glow eyeglasses, blow-up guitars, noisemakers, hats and much more.

The all-time favourite party giveaway is the glow necklace, says Dominion Smallwares' Steve Dennis, but recently, the glow necklace's popularity has been superseded by the light-up buttons or light-emitting diodes (LED), their technical name.

"The prices of the buttons have come down to the prices of necklaces," he says, "and they're selling briskly." Available in different shapes, including hearts, stars and flowers, the buttons can be worn on clothing or ears.

Along with light-up buttons and glow necklaces, the 44-inch bubble-gum tub is another hot seller at Dominion Smallwares.

Dennis says his party shop's strength is "selling but not overselling and fitting the items and budget to the venue."

Dominion Smallwares has been in the toy/novelty/candy business for 25 years. A wholesaler of glow products to outdoor vendors in the mid-'90s, Dennis opened a party shop because he got frequent requests for novelty items for bar and bat mitzvahs.

Revolutionizing the way you celebrate events

Freedom of Sound's current themes include this Survivor/Jungle setup.

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Miki Klevan of Freedom of Sound (905-760-0040; www.fos.ca) wants every party to be unique, memorable and fun well into the wee hours of the morning.

Since 1996, Freedom of Sound has "helped revolutionize the way you celebrate special events," Klevan says.

The company has three divisions: entertainment, games and amusements and decor centre. They co-ordinate every kind of celebration: bar and bat mitzvahs, weddings, birthdays, anniversaries and corporate events. They supply all your needs from special effects to linens – everything but dinner. And their professional services cover all fields from florists to videographers, including an event producer to make sure things run smoothly.

Freedom of Sound entertainment offers 200 entertainers and DJs. These include celebrity look-alikes, impersonators, musicians, singers, comedians, airbrush, henna and tattoo artists. For high-end events, there are acts such as Kool & the Gang, or Earth, Wind & Fire.

Freedom of Sound doesn't hire people who entertain as a sideline, but full-time professionals. Klevan says people take work more seriously if they earn their living from it. Some of them, such as the DJs and MCs, work only for Freedom of Sound. Specialty acts, such as Kool & the Gang, also perform elsewhere.

Producing a successful event can be a challenge that requires long hours of research and endless decisions. Freedom of Sound's one-stop shopping makes party planning less stressful and saves time and money. Their event specialists help create an entertainment package based on your needs, and guide you throughout the process.

Klevan advises booking one to two years ahead; the farther ahead, the wider your choice of entertainers. He won't take more parties than he can handle at a high level of quality.

"Fewer events, but higher quality give us a good name," he says. "This takes a long time and lots of work to build, but it's the basis for solid growth. We don't spread ourselves too thin."

The company's performers take the word "interactive" seriously. They're good at breaking the ice: if the crowd is a bit shy, they're out there, teaching dance steps, joking, handing out give-aways, doing what it takes to warm things up.

Freedom of Sound's games and amusements division offers a broad selection of inflatable games, carnival and casino games and video arcades. Inflatable games include perennial favourites, such as castles kids can crawl around and bounce in. The company also provide sound, staging and entertainment personnel, if these go with a game. And there's an in-house novelty store for items like party hats.

Freedom of Sound's games, like its sound and lighting systems, are constantly updated. Twice a year, the company brings in the latest games from American trade shows; they like to introduce state-of-the-art games early in the year, before Purim.

The company recently moved into new facilities in the Dufferin-Steeles area and held a grand opening of its the decor centre on Feb. 3. Open by appointment only, the centre is a 5,000-square foot showroom, set up as two different theme parties at any given time. The company makes its own props and scenic backdrops; you'll see the artists at work when you go in.

These themes change every two months, and with enough notice, the company can also make changes for a client. Klevan recommends booking the decor centre six months to a year ahead for your party.

The centre's current themes are Hollywood and Survivor/Jungle. The backdrops and props for the Survivor party include 16-foot palm trees, animals and zebra chair covers. For the Hollywood party, props include a red carpet with stanchions and red velvet rope, 10-foot Oscar statues, acrylic centrepieces that light up and a Hollywood Hills backdrop.

If ice sculptures go with your theme, check out the ones the company keeps in its giant freezer. Freedom of Sound also has a large selection of chair covers, linens and overlays; elegant Chiavari chairs in mahogany and black; decorative dishes; silver and gold candelabras for a traditional look; computerized lighting for a contemporary look; and drapes in a variety of fabrics, colours and heights.

Jewelry makes a great gift

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

The world of jewelry is rich with history and contemporary creations continue to sparkle.

Depending on whom the gift is for, you can jump back in time or go ultra-modern, as long as the workmanship is superb.

Klein says the company primarily makes custom-order designs tailored to the desires of the client.

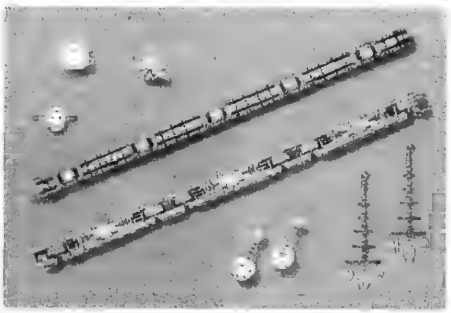
"We sit down with the customer and create whatever they have in mind," Klein says. First Klein makes a wax carving, and once the customer approves it, he goes ahead with the final product.

If a customer is a little uncertain, Klein says, "it's my job to come up with brilliant ideas."

He notes diamonds and gemstones are popular bar/bat mitzvah gifts, but unusual sapphires, emeralds and rubies have just as much flair.

"Most people lean towards a better grade stone," Klein says.

For lovers of Victorian, Edwardian and other types of antique or estate jewelry, Harvey Kessler Inc. (416-260-4653), formerly known as Gold Traders, offers a trove of historical jewels.



Various jewelry pieces from Harvey Kessler Inc.

Kessler says the craftsmanship in old times was dynamic and perhaps unmatched today.

"In [Victorian] times, a craftsman would sit down for a month and make everything by hand," Klein says.

"You'd see incredible designs… People in these periods had strong artistic influences that came through in the jewelry."

Along with the unique designs in antique jewelry, Kessler says clients are attracted to dated pieces.

"When somebody buys an engagement ring [from us], they know they will never see anything else that will resemble it. They feel they are buying something that there is only one of in the world," Kessler says, noting some people like to wear jewelry that was once worn by the rich and famous.

Kessler says that speedy, high-calibre service is also something clients should look for when selecting the right place to buy jewelry. Kessler has sold bands and rings from as early as 1765 and his jewelry has been on the wish lists of such famous people as Jane Fonda, Whoopi Goldberg and Elizabeth Hurley.

Harvey Kessler Inc. also sells antique furniture, silverware and oil paintings.

Kids' boutiques offer designer fashions for everyday use

By RUTH SCHWIETZER
Special to The CJN

Boutiques selling kids' fashions found a new niche in formal wear after discount and chain stores moved into high quality children's clothing, formerly the exclusive territory of boutiques.

"The market has been changing," says Santina Mariani of Zero 20 Bambini (905-851-6041, www.zero20.com), with most parents now shopping at discount and chain stores for their kids' play clothes and heading to boutiques for clothing for special occasions.

Mariani says the children's fashion market shifted when the quality and styling of the clothing at discount and chain stores improved dramatically, while prices stayed relatively low.

But those stores are far from the top retailers of children's formal wear or dressy casual wear, a new high-end category in kids' fashions, or of high-end kids' designer fashions for everyday. In those areas, boutiques such as Zero 20 excel with their superior selection and service.

Boutique customers need not fear the prices, Mariani says, adding some of the prices of American and European kids' designer lines have come down in the past 20 years.

Infants' sleepers from France used to retail at $70 to $80, but now sleepers of comparable quality from Spain are $40. "You can buy $10 pajamas from Wal-Mart that are good quality," Mariani says, "but they don't compare with what we have for $40."

Mariani goes on regular fashion-buying trips to Europe, Italy and New York. She won't buy anything that's too expensive, she says. Miniman, a popular line of boys' casual dressy wear from France, costs 20 per cent less at Zero 20. "For the past two years, people have been buying here instead of in Europe."

Mariani says Zero 20's customers are usually blown away by the store's 3,200 square feet packed with kids fashions. "I'm sure we have the biggest inventory in Toronto," she says. "We carry all the brands."

The store name, Zero 20, indicates the size range that the store carries, for both boys and girls. The higher end of sizes used to be for boys only, Mariani says, but manufacturers have responded to the demand for girls' clothing in larger sizes. Zero 20 has a good selection of clothes for chubby children, she adds, so "hard to fit is not really a problem for us."

Zero 20 carries the usual children's formal wear, suits for boys and full-length gowns for girls, but Mariani says the hottest category of kids' clothing for special occasions is dressy casual. Dressy casual has become a popular style for guests at special events, who want to dress a little more casually than the bar mitzvah boy or the birthday girl, but still feel dressed up.

VHS memories can be transfered to DVD

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to the CJN

The family that still relies on VHS tapes and VCRs may feel taunted by the refrain, "C'mon, everyone's doing it." And "it" means DVDs, the format surging into the home-entertainment video market.

Toronto resident Janet Morais recently discovered that the new technology can alter the home-video experience, giving her the idea to start DVD Memories (416-785-5545). The eight-month-old, home-based business transfers VHS tapes to DVDs, peppered with Morais' editing and music touches.

"Instead of watching hours of unedited footage," she says, referring to the majority of video-captured memories, "a DVD is more interactive, with menus and chapters and skipping options."

Indeed, Morais' discs let you jump from scene to scene, so you can pass on Uncle Morty's slightly inebriated rant and skip to little Nathan dancing the horah.

The idea came to Morais when she attended a friend's wedding and watched a slide show that included hundreds of old pictures. Realizing how valuable pictures and their memories are to those reaching a milestone — be it a wedding or a birthday — Morais harnessed the video-editing power of her iMac, bought the software programs iMovie and iDVD and started a business that is staking new ground in post-party entertainment.

"People care about preserving their memories," Morais says, adding that the popularity of DVD players bridges the technology gap between young and old.

Of her 40 clients so far, some have requested DVD video cards for Father's Day or 60th birthdays.

"Most people love this idea because it's new and exciting and original," Morais says.

Morais doesn't limit herself to VHS transfers. She can scan photos, invitations, transparencies and additional media. She also works with super-8 reels.

A straight video-to-DVD transfer costs $50 to $75 per hour of videotape, plus the same additional rate for editing services. For extra copies of the finished DVD, Morais charges $20 each.

A graduate of Ryerson University's photography arts program, Morais is knowledgeable about what makes an attractive visual.

But as a parent, she also knows all about attention spans — she edited a 45-minute tape of her daughter's birth down to a two-minute music video.

"Kids don't want to see their parents' unedited wedding video," she says. "They want the condensed one-hour version. I can do that, while also adding music and memory timelines."

The timelines Morais produces are similar to those chronological slide shows that trace, for example, a bar mitzvah boy from newborn to new Jewish mensch.

Interested clients should be aware of several facts, though: their DVD players must be DVD-R compatible; they can involve themselves as much as they like in the time-consuming editing process; turnaround time is two to four weeks; and Morais advises clients to organize pictures so she doesn't have to guess at their sequential order.

Morais finds the job satisfying but work occasionally leaks into off-duty hours, albeit sometimes in a pleasantly surprising way.

"I'll be walking down the street and I'll see someone that looks familiar. Then it hits me: He was in the video footage I just edited. I feel quite connected with the client, especially because he's showing me personal pictures of his family. It's an honour."

'Navy suits continue to be Korry's top sellers'

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Korry's Clothiers, one of the best-known menswear retailers in Toronto, has specialized in selling suits since the company opened its doors 51 years ago.

President Saul Korman staked out the store's current location at 569 Danforth Ave. in 1969, long before the east-end neighbourhood became fashionable. Today, Korry's (416-463-1115) striking stone and glass storefront is part of a trendy retail strip of outdoor cafés, restaurants and specialty boutiques in the heart of Greektown.

While the neighbourhood has changed and Korry's has gone through a facelift or two over the years and expanded its range of merchandise, Korman says its core business of selling suits remains unchanged.

These days, Korry's offers a wide range of leisure wear – sweaters, sport shirts and slacks – and business wear – suits, blazers and dress shirts – as well as a variety of accessories. But suits in the mid- to high range in price are the mainstay of the business, Korman says.

"We cater to people of all budgets. They can start with Roberto, our private in-house label – it's good value – and as their income grows they can move to designer suits by Arnold Brant, Strellson, Coppley, Hugo Boss and Canali. As their budget grows, we grow with them."

Korman has seen many changes in the merchandising of suits in his 51 years in the industry.

One of the biggest changes he has seen is the move from made-to-measure to ready-to-wear suits. According to Korman, the improvement in the quality of ready-made suits changed consumers' buying patterns.

Ready-made suits are more common today than made-to-measure ones, he says, because the quality of the factory garments has improved with the automation of the tailoring. He says Korry's used to specialize in made-to-measure suits, but the off-the-rack suits are far more popular. Alterations help customize the fit, which is why he has six full-time tailors on staff.

"Our Roberto two-for-one-suit-and-slack program and the dress-shirts program have been an introduction to our store for young people. This special pricing is very popular with them. We also get a lot of sports celebrities. They like our huge selection and customer service and shopping in this great neighbourhood."

Korman says it used to be customary for men to buy winter and summer suits, but now they buy suits of lighter material that can be worn year-round.

He emphasizes the importance of classics in a man's wardrobe.

"Navy suits and black and navy blazers continue to be Korry's top sellers. The navy suit is still in 12 months a year."

He advises overweight men to buy dark-coloured suits with two or three button jackets and to wear suspenders and pleated pants for a better fit.

"A vested suit in solids or nice gentlemanly stripes in navy, black and gray is also very slimming."

He recommends two-button suits for short men, because this style will make them look taller.

As for elegant attire, Korman says a tuxedo is still the trend at black-tie events, particularly the black tuxedo, but the once-popular white dinner jacket is now only seen on the occasional cruise.

Korry's carries one of the world's best-selling tuxedos, a black three-button vested tux by Hugo Boss, he says.

Korry's offers another alternative – "the tuxless tux," a black suit with removable silk collar.

"A lot of young people like a three-piece black suit done by Hugo Boss or Canali for weddings and graduations."

These days, he says, suits are more tailored, with more side and centre vents, while pants are narrower, with one or two pleats (though he advises heavier men to stick with a double-pleated pant).

Korman says there's nothing like a great-looking suit. "When you wear the right fitted suit in the right colour, the right style and accessorize it correctly, you feel better and perform better in every aspect of your life."

Liven up a party with a band

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Live Jewish music can set the tone for your simchah.

"The music creates… an atmosphere where people feel relaxed. It's a Jewish atmosphere. The music is enjoyable to listen to. It's very relaxing," says Jonno Lightstone, leader of the klezmer band, Hu-Tsa-Tsa, (416-651-7521).

The use of klezmer bands has become increasingly common at bar and bat mitzvahs and weddings, he says.

"Usually the first thing is to get people dancing. We play freilachs – happy, lively songs for dancing. That's how we start a party."

Hu-Tsa-Tsa creates a Jewish atmosphere.

Lightstone says they play lively songs to get people dancing, and then during the meal, they usually switch to quieter, slower songs that don't drown out dinner conversation.

Three musicians make up the core group of Hu-Tsa-Tsa: Lightstone on clarinet, violinist Rona Goldensher and Eric Stein, who plays the Hungarian cimbalom and the mandocello, a mandolin with a cello range.

They may play as a trio or with only two members, and they can add musicians such as a bass player, or singer David Wall, who does the Yiddish repertoire.

Hu-Tsa-Tsa is skilled in a variety of styles, Lightstone says. "We're very versatile. We can do classical and jazz, and swing for later in the evening. Eric plays keyboard, so we can do some swing and jazz."

Swing, which refers to music with a 1930s sound, has become popular for dancing in the last seven or eight years, Lightstone says. "It's the kind of music that people in various age groups like to dance to."

Hu-Tsa-Tsa can also do classical music during dinner, he adds, noting that Goldensher is an accomplished classical musician; she plays in Tafelmusik, a Toronto-based baroque orchestra.

Whatever the musical style they play, the goal of the band is the same, Lightstone says. "We want to make the party the best it can be by creating a happy and leibedik atmosphere."

When Hu-Tsa-Tsa is booked for an event, Lightstone and the host meet to discuss the music. "We talk about the evening's flow of events. We can organize the music around what they're planning. We're also used to working with the DJs."

Hu-Tsa-Tsa has played many concerts around Toronto. "When we're playing concerts, we play a repertoire not as commonly known," says Lightstone. "Most of the klezmer repertoire is listening music. The concert is more contemplative, slower. They are songs that show off the ability of the players."

Last year, the group was awarded a Canada Council grant to produce a CD, which is to be released in the fall. "It will be a collection of traditional songs using our own arrangements based on the traditional style," Lightstone says.

Lightstone, who is from Detroit, did not grow up hearing traditional Jewish music at home. "No Yiddish was spoken. The closest thing was Fiddler on the Roof."

A live band has many advantages

He had been playing saxophone in a band when he heard klezmer music for the first time 15 years ago while travelling on the west coast. "I knew right away that this music felt right for me."

He then took up the clarinet so that he could play klezmer music. "It took time to play with an authentic sound. I learned by listening to the authentic recordings."

Isaac Oziel, leader of the band Nu-Rhythm and president of Rio Entertainment (905-882-5252), a live music entertainment company, comes from a musical family. He was immersed in traditional Sephardi music as a young child growing up in Morocco. When his family immigrated to Canada – he was 13 at the time – they joined their large extended family in Toronto.

"I have 57 first cousins in Toronto," Oziel says. "We're all Orthodox. My uncle is the cantor of the shul Petah Tikvah; so was my dad at one time. We're a singing family."

A trumpet and keyboard player, Oziel has an extensive music background. As a teenager he played in his father's band (Samuel O and his Orchestra), continuing throughout university.

Oziel got an engineering degree and an MBA and for many years, he relegated music to hobby status. When his eldest son had his bar mitzvah 12 years ago, Oziel put together a live band for the occasion and played at the simchah. That evening led to many other bookings for the band, which later came to be known as Nu-Rhythm.

"It sounded so good at the bar mitzvah the guys asked me to keep the band going and to get back into the market. In a couple of years, we were doing 60 events a year, and we've never looked back."

Eventually Oziel quit the corporate world and focused on Nu-Rhythm. He says the band was so successful he couldn't keep up with the demand. So he created another band, the Rhythm Kings, to provide the same musical sound and repertoire.

His bands are in demand for many reasons, Oziel says. "They are very successful in keeping people on the dance floor. It's a combination of many different ingredients – excellent musicians and singers, being able to read the crowd to know what the party needs. That's my skill – producing the music required for the evening. Knowing what to play is key. You need to keep the material new.

"The music includes Jewish favourites as well as Motown, disco, rock 'n' roll, the oldies. We have good, current, dance music. It's a balance between older fun music and new music.

"The Jewish content all depends on the party. Some people want one horah, others want more. It all depends on the host's wishes. We meet and talk to discuss the client's needs."

Nu-Rhythm and the Rhythm Kings are nine- piece bands with six musicians and three singers.

Rio Entertainment also has four- and five-piece bands, says Oziel. "A four- to six-piece band is a better fit for smaller parties with 100 to 175 guests. They cover the same material. Budget-wise it makes more sense."

For bar mitzvahs and other events, he offers DJ services, noting that his entertainers can make a smooth transition between the band and the DJ. "Kids enjoy the DJ. The combination is very successful."

Rio Entertainment has also put together a new band – Simcha-Nu – which plays religious music to serve the Orthodox community better, Oziel says.

"Some… young couples prefer this type of music. The men and women dance separately. That's the market we're going to be addressing. We have a couple of weddings lined up already."

Rio Entertainment can also provide a band on short notice because the company has a wide pool of musicians, says Oziel.

"We have a large group of talented subs to draw on who play in all the different groups. We can create the same effect. We can duplicate ourselves without ever diluting the quality. I make sure we have the same high quality performers."

The extended Oziel family members make up the Oziel choir, Oziel notes. There are about 20 male cousins who sing for each other during wedding ceremonies. Oziel is making these live performers available for simchahs through Rio Entertainment.

"We're now going to be offering the choir services for wedding ceremonies. The choir is entwined in the service. It's beautiful music. A lot of people are very emotional when they hear the choir singing. It sets the tone for the family."

Other services available through Rio Entertainment include special performances of The Three Tenors, Canadian singers who do 20- to 30-minute shows; string quartets; mariachi and klezmer bands; and performers who impersonate Tina Turner, Rod Steward, Elvis and others.

Oziel says using a live band has many advantages.

"It's not just the music, it's also a performance. We entertain people. People feel they're participating with the dancing. When we have the three singers harmonizing, moving and shaking, it's a special ambiance."

Other bands advertising in this supplement are: The 42nd Street Band, 416-441-1555; Ambiance Flute & Guitar Duo, 416-693-8778; Elegant Jazz, 416-781-1222; Fern Lindzon Musical Entertainment, 416-225-6977; Flying Bulgar Productions, 416-603-7237; Fabulous Harvey Siegal Band,416-782-9202; Joe Star Band, 905-881-1378; The Kenny Simon Band, 416-638-2549; Kory Livingstone Band, 905-669-0728; Lorraine Ingle, Pianist, 416-698-6824; Matt Pines Band, 416-234-5500; Paul Zurin, 905-770-3084; Rhonda Silver, 416-269-5703; Rio Entertainment Ltd., 905-882-5252; Mark Selby, 416-784-1554; The Rick Levine Band, 905-881-6400.

Hart provides a host of fun things to do

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

The hipper the initial tone of a party, the greater chance the evening will be a hit, says Phil Hart of interactive entertainment giant Hart Entertainment (416-762-2200).

"It all starts right before [the party] begins," Hart says. "You have to set the tempo."

Hart says he is in the "foyer business" because it is in the foyers of synagogues and banquet halls that Hart Entertainment provides guests with a host of fun things to do.

Casinos, air hockey, Polaroid booths, arcade games and miniature golf are a few of the activities Hart Entertainment offers.

Hart says the activities can coincide with themes. For instance, if the bar mitzvah boy or girl is a car racing fan, Hart will provide remote control slot cars.

What matters most is fun, not merely from participating, but from observing, says Hart.

"I always tell parents that they should [have things] that are as much or more fun to watch, as to play," he says.

"If you want a party where will people will laugh and smile, that's our type of party."

Hart Entertainment dates back to 30 years ago, when Phil would take his 11-year-old brother, David with him to put on magic shows at corporate gigs.

The company has since expanded. Today, there are 12 full-time employees and 45 part-time staffers.

The company specializes in corporate events, but works on roughly 100 bar and bat mitzvahs each year.

Who's going to beat the Mighty Ducks?

Because Hart uses so many different games and activities, the company has collected an extensive arsenal of entertainment equipment. If they don't have it, they'll buy it.

"We own [lots] of the equipment, so we are able to pull things together," Hart says.

While themes vary, Hart says hockey and casinos are "huge."

The company has even brought live performers to an affair, such as a Marilyn Monroe impersonator.

"People want all sorts of different things," Hart says, adding that a recent bar mitzvah included a rock climbing display.

Although the party business is a competitive one, Hart says he prefers to "coexist" instead of competing with other entertainment companies.

Recognizing that some people may not enjoy dancing, Hart can tailor the entertainment to the crowd, bringing in caricaturists or magicians, as well as popcorn machines and snow cones.

"We include things that really add to the evening," he says.

High-quality daywear can double as party wear for your kids

Boys' dressy casual wear includes the Miniman line, which Mariani says is popular but not the most expensive line she carries. A Miniman suit for infants and toddlers includes pants, a T-shirt and a loose-fitting jacket made of linen instead of wool. "French makes have found a look that's not everyday but not formal," Mariani says.

For girls, in dressy casual, Zero 20 carries a large selection of dresses, starting at $49 and going up to $300, with the most popular selling at the mid-range of $100.

Zero 20 has a large staff as well as on-site seamstresses. As a party-supplement special, customers who mention Zero 20's ad get their next purchase tax free.

Because of its location on St. Clair West, the children's department store, Amore Children's Boutique (416-654-8117), used to be a well-kept secret, and had mainly an Italian and Portuguese clientele.

But the rest of the community has finally discovered what Amore's Italian and Portuguese customers have known for years, that a large selection of unique kids' apparel – clothing you won't find in a mall – lies behind Amore's unassuming storefront.

Susan Young of Amore Children's Boutique.

When Susan Young, a former elementary-school teacher, opened her first children's clothing store 16 years ago, after the birth of her own two children, someone suggested she locate the business on St. Clair West.

"The store was geared to the ethnic community," she says, "as the ethnic community likes nice clothing."

Her first store was 900 square feet, but when it developed a following, she moved to a 2,000-square-foot building down the street.

"It became a vibrant business," Young says.

"I love what I'm doing," she says. "I do all the buying, the marketing and sales. I'm hands-on."

Amore's specialty is casual elegance for boys with lines such as Miniman, which Young says is "designed for mothers who like their children to look well-dressed without looking formal."

For boys, Amore carries high-end suits and shirts by designers such as Perry Ellis. This season, the store has a varied selection of shirts and ties in blues, greens, golds, blues and mustard. Young says Amore is "a little bit like Harry Rosen for kids."

Amore doesn't carry formal wear for girls, nor girly, frilly dresses, but offers high-quality daywear that can double as party wear.

"It's the European look: bright colours that make a statement without being gaudy," Young says.

Amore also carries the recently launched DKNY line for girls.

Young says in children's wear, spring begins in February and by July, she starts getting a selection of European winter coats. Sale time for spring and summer clothing begins in June. Many parents take their children shopping to the store after they get back from camp, to outfit them with fall and holiday clothing.

Amore's sales staff has been with Young almost from the time she opened her first store. Staff members will help customers put together co-ordinated wardrobes and a seamstress is available to do alterations.

"Service is first and foremost in our philosophy," Young says.

Make a spectacle of your guests with body art

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Melanie Marcus and the artistic staff of Little Miss Henna can bring colour and fun to a simchah with safe and fun body art.

Founded by Marcus six years ago, Little Miss Henna (905-731-0067) was one of the first Toronto-area companies to introduce the traditional henna painting to bar and bat mitzvahs and sweet sixteens, says Marcus. "I saw people using henna in Europe and thought that it would be an activity children and adults could enjoy at simchahs and other parties."

Henna, a flower from the Middle East and India, contains an all-natural dye that can last from two to three weeks. It is traditionally used by Hindu, Indian and Sephardi Jewish women before a wedding, she explains. "It's just a temporary tattoo."

These days, most of Little Miss Henna's clients prefer a quick-drying body paint instead of the traditional henna, which takes longer to dry, Marcus says.

"The paint dries instantly and can last three to six days. That's our most popular service. It takes one minutes to do and one minute to dry. Parents and kids love it. The bubbies and zaides love it too."

Tiny crystals can be added to the art to embellish the design, she notes. "These sparkle tattoos can last up to one week."

Guests can choose designs from a design board with themes that appeal to both boys and girls, she adds.

Little Miss Henna has also introduced other services, such as personalized leather bracelets, and beaded pens and key chains, which are very popular with party guests, Marcus says.

"We try to add something new every year. The pewter key chain is a new hot item," she says.

"People fill out their order form for the personalized items, which are done on the spot in about an hour-and-a-half so guests can take them home after the party," she says. "It's a party give-away, but the kids have input, so they appreciate it more. It combines a memory of the party as well as entertainment."

She says the leather bracelets and key chains appeal to boys because there are a lot of sports designs to choose from.

"Parents are happy that we've been able to come with a lot of boy's themes."

When Marcus started Little Miss Henna, she was its sole artist. Today, she has 35 part-time staff who can provide a number of services, depending on a client's needs.

"Parents love our service. They love how our staff is so friendly, and so outgoing. We get a lot of repeat customers all the time. It makes me feel great that we've provided such a good service that they're re-booking for their next child's simchah."

Total Bodyart (416-706-6317), offers a variety of artistic body painting services to enhance any party or simchah. People can choose from a number of body art forms, including temporary tattoos, henna, body paint, body crystals and nail art.

Karen Dubiner, founder of Total Bodyart, is now in her fifth year of providing this multi-dimensional art cum entertainment service. The Thornhill resident is a former art student in Arts York, a four-year intensive arts program at Unionville High School.

She applied her arts training to body painting and henna art when she was a student at the University of Western Ontario and continued after she graduated because there was such a strong demand for the service, she says.

Today, Total Bodyart has 10 part-time employees, most of whom have art backgrounds, "so they're really good," says Dubiner. "Some even have full-time jobs, but they come out on weekends because they love the work."

Total Bodyart does summer and corporate events, street festivals and bat and bar mitzvahs. "We give people the best prices and the best value for their money."

The company does some henna, but because multicoloured body paint needs only a short time to dry, it has been extremely popular in the last year or so, Dubiner explains.

Clients can choose from Total Bodyart's large design collection, she says.

"I have roughly 1,500 designs to choose from. I can gear the design to any kind of theme, from sports to music to dance. But it's not necessary to choose a theme. The clients choose whatever they want for the mini tattoo parlour."

The company is also known for its temporary tattoo transfers, Dubiner says. "I have them custom made for the bar or bat mitzvahs or corporate events. I can special design ones for bar mitzvahs to fit with the party theme – a picture, a logo. It's all in the planning. Even the backing can be customized."

Total Bodyart offers different kinds of packages that can incorporate several services, depending on a client's needs.

"The kids love the service," says Dubiner. "We always have friendly outgoing people who ensure that the tattoos look good and every one has a good time."

"The adults love it as much than the kids. At a recent bat mitzvah, the adults waited until the kids were done with the body painting. And then it was their turn. They really had a lot of fun with the stuff."

Rental companies make great party affordable

By ERIN SILVER
Special to The CJN

If you're throwing a party this season, you may need to rent a few items to make your bash a smash hit.

"We do complete party service rentals and tents," says owner Tony D'Amato, whose family has been in the business for over 30 years.

The company even rents fine bone china, coffee urns, dance floors and lighting, which comes in handy for the increasing number of people choosing to host their party outdoors. "The trend is becoming more and more popular," says D'Amato.

"Having an outdoor event creates a more relaxed environment and puts people at ease. It's also great to make use of a nice backyard."

Since summer is the busiest season for parties, D'Amato recommends calling four to six weeks in advance to discuss your needs and place an order. "I encourage customers to call in and speak with a party rental consultant. We'll be happy to answer their questions and invite them into our showroom," he says.

For tent rentals, the company will visit the client's home to take measurements, recommend a tent and discuss the event.

"We also offer delivery and pick up services. And most convenient of all, cutlery and dinnerware can be returned unwashed," says D'Amato.

If you're looking for a unique way to keep the kids – and adults – at your party entertained, why not call Starburst Coin Machines Inc. (416-251-2122; www.starburstcoin.com)? The company is the largest vendor, renter and operator of full-size arcade games in the GTA.

"Our most popular games are full-size simulators," says Allan Howe, rental manager and promotions manager for the company.

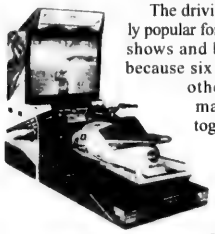
"Our ski simulator includes a 50 inch screen, which you stand in front of on a platform, and you simulate the movement of skiing with your body," he says, noting they also rent snowboard, surfboard and driving simulation games, as well as pool tables, air hockey tables and table soccer, or foosball.



The driving games are especially popular for corporate events, trade shows and bar and bat mitzvahs because six people can race each other at once when the machines are linked together.

"It can be so hard to entertain kids at the bar mitzvah age, so these games are perfect," says Howe. "It's something different and interactive. It's even entertaining for adults!"

He recommends calling at least a week in advance. Prices range depending on the game.

TorontoPartyGuide.com offers one-stop party planning

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

It may be a cliché, but like all clichés it has the ring of truth.

"The Net is the wave of the future," says Rick Levine, founder of the site www.torontopartyguide.com.

This coming from a man who "is old enough to remember watching the Beatles on the black-and-white Ed Sullivan Show." Who says age matters in the dot-com world?

For the party planner in need of quick and accurate information on party-related businesses, Levine's site is the complete package: it lists vendors and links to their Web sites, from wedding organizers to party consultants to balloon-makers.

Levine's three-year-old site, which attracts an average of 10,000 hits per month, is linked to his twice yearly party-planning shows, also called TorontoPartyGuide. More than 80 exhibitors display their wares at the events – the next one is Oct. 22 at Beth Tzedec Congregation – and have the opportunity to market their products year round on the Web site.

His site offers a free listing and link to businesses that participate in the show. Companies can also get an e-mail address, or a domain name, from torontopartyguide.com.

Levine (rick@torontopartyguide.com) aims to ease the hectic party-planning experience. "Who wants to run around from store to store?" he asks rhetorically. "My site is the place to check out up-to-date info when planning a simchah."

Asked why he started the site, Levine said people want to access the show's vendors 24 hours a day, seven days a week.

Forget the phone book, he says.

"The advantage of the Net over the Yellow Pages is that you can see colourful detailed pictures, you can obtain more info, and hear audio clips [from bands]."

Involved in the party-planning business for 25 years, Levine is also bandleader of the Rick Levine Band, so he understands the importance of marketing and name recognition, and that all vendors need maximum exposure.

Why not include everyone?

"We attract the top vendors to our show," he says, "and they in turn end up on the site. It's up to the client to find the most suitable business. And twice a year, the client can actually meet and see the vendors they have been learning about through the Net."

(Traffic surges to 30,000 hits per month closer to the show.)

Also ideal is the no-pressure option of window-shopping online.

"When shopping, you generally want information without [making] commitments," Levine says.

For Jewish customers, the link to bar/bat mitzvah resources is a unique feature. "We're open to everyone, but we seem to cater to a niche crowd," Levine says.

While that crowd is predominantly Jewish, old and the young visit the Web site, Levine says, adding it's not uncommon for party-planners to seek information from the comfort of their home, without battling road traffic.

And who is the site's typical customer? Levine doesn't miss a beat. "A smart one."

Mr. Disc Jockey provides 'seamless entertainment'

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Entertainment is responsible for 80 per cent of your party's success, says Ed McMurtry, owner of Mister Disc Jockey (1-877-473-3800, www.mrdj.com). Good music and dancing make the food taste better, and a modest venue looks great, he adds.

McMurtry has been a pioneer in his field since 1989, when many people had never heard the word "interactive." Familiar as the term is now, he gives it an aura of freshness, and welcomes the challenge of trying to please today's sophisticated audience.

"We push the envelope in blurring the line between stage and dance floor, guest and entertainer," he says.

The watchword is "seamless entertainment" – everything blends into a whole. If there's a theme, everything meshes, from dancers to decor.

"If we do Hawaii," McMurtry says, "bring suntan lotion: it's gonna be hot, hot, hot!"

Under parent company Edwin Allen Productions, Mister Disc Jockey competes for awards with such names as the Walt Disney Company and the Calgary Stampede. Corporate clients include Petro Canada and Prudential. This year, Mister Disc Jockey received the Canadian Events Industry Award for Best Entertainment for a Private Individual.

The company serves every demographic from schoolchildren to businesspeople, at events for dozens of participants or thousands. Five of its parties this year have been all-women events, the most recent sponsored by CHUM-FM and Blue Mountain.

Staff are highly trained and attend ongoing workshops to hone their skills and develop new ones, including improvising, impersonating guests and dealing with contingencies like a power outage.

Teamwork is essential, McMurtry says. One team member, Amber Richardson, is enrolled in the Special Event Management course through George Washington University. Another, member, Laurie Rose, is responsible for bar mitzvahs and for developing computerized music systems.

Then there's Paul Saunders, leader of McMurtry's current project, "Loud Neighbours." These are interactive party animals that fill the void between human jukebox and live band.

Interactive entertainment meshes everything from dancers to decor

In one of the Loud Neighbours' scenes, for example, a flamboyant maitre d' frantically directs waiters around the room, sometimes hindering, sometimes helping. A greasy-spoon cook emerges from the kitchen, slaps down a dish, says to a guest: "Here's your damn dessert," and complains about the performers.

The whole staff, including the maitre d', join the complaints – and segue into the featured act. At one event, with the theme Winter in Paris, they danced the can-can and enticed the guests to join a conga line.

Arriving at a family event, the guests enter the ballroom, only to face an obstacle course of technical equipment, makeup artists, a large plywood backdrop and a surprised stage manager who wants to know what you're doing backstage.

The stage manager asks if they've ever been in a fashion show, and they say no. He tells them to follow Bimbi and Bambi up the stairs around the backdrop – and they find themselves on a real catwalk, as audience members applaud. They join the audience and applaud the next guest, and so on.

Guests at another simchah, which used Mister Disc Jockey's award-winning bat mitzvah theme, Starry Night, guests arrived on the second floor sound stage of a movie studio. After cocktails, Charlie Chaplin directed them into a steel cage freight elevator that lowered them into a pool of mist. Then they rounded the corner to the main sound stage, which was a Starry Night – a large wall lit as a night sky, with shimmering bits of glass to simulate stars.

While the adults enjoyed their meal, the children returned to the upstairs cocktail area, which had been retro-fitted into Studio 54, complete with go-go cages, dancers and fluorescent lighting. An hour later, the kids returned to the main room for a horah and all-ages party.

The idea is to get guests to participate, McMurtry says. An MC, for example, tosses an inflatable rubber mike into the audience. An introvert lets it go by; someone else picks it up, and the MC invites him or her onstage. If that person feels shy, the mike passes on until it is in the hands of someone who wants to perform.

In case you find it hard to catch up with McMurtry, who's working at events as far away as Hawaii, he invites you to his headquarters at comfortable Edwin Allen Ranch, north of Markham. "It's out here," he says, "that we raise the party animals."

No party is too big, or too small. He promises to make any event unique, "from two speakers and a microphone to a gala."

He likes smaller, intimate parties for their special ambience, he says. It's easier to get guests involved.

"There's only one circumstance where we couldn't help you – if you want an average DJ for an average event. If you're looking for the life of the party, at the party of your life, come see us."

Tom's Place offers designer quality without the designer price

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

If you're in the market for a designer men's suit without the designer price tag, head over to Tom's Place. (416-596-0297)

While this high-fashion store is in an unlikely place – at 190 Baldwin St., it's next door to a fish store in Kensington Market – the discount designer fashion retailer draws savvy shoppers who want to buy quality name-brand apparel without having to take out second mortgages on their homes.

And while he offers both men's and women's clothing, menswear makes up the bulk of the business, he says. "Per square foot, I sell more menswear than anyone else in the city."

In addition to the designer labels, Tom's Place has its own label. "We offer ready-to-wear suits made of cloth from the finest mills in the world. We sell a lot of suits. That's the mainstay of our business."

Suits under the Tom's Place label are manufactured in Montreal from super 120- to 150-grade purchased in Italy. "These are lightweight, soft on the hand. We buy these materials from Cerutti. A lot of these fabrics are not usually available in ready-wear suits."

These suits are priced at $695 to $795, while designer DKNY suits retail for $399 to $499. "I recommend the DKNY suits for a younger crowd in their 20s and 30s."

Mihalik says this year there are more wool suits – 100 per cent lightweight wool – and more pin stripes and subtle checks in blue and grays. "Brown is also very important as the main colour. The classic standard colours like navy, black and charcoal never go out of fashion."

He notes that two- and three-button jackets with slightly narrower lapels are the trend. "We're going back to the '60s and '70s – two-button jackets with centre or side vents, and single or no pleat trousers. The emphasis is on a trimmer silhouette and more tailored clothing instead of wide-bodied garments."

The suits should hug the body slightly, he continues. "There's more hand workmanship in the suits than before. The waistlines are narrower."

For the summer, cotton and linen suits in pastel colours are popular here and in Europe, and beige, olive green and black linen suits are important.

Tom's Place also boasts a large assortment of shirts, ties and other accessories.

These days, Mihalik is showing a lot of white and blue-checked and striped shirts, while ties, which are more subdued, are in regimental stripes and traditional patterns.

The store has been at its current location at 190 Baldwin St. since 1980, the year Mihalik bought his father's second-hand clothing business, which was established shortly after the family emigrated from Hungry in 1958.

The original business was housed in a tiny 500-square-foot space located behind a kosher slaughter house on Kensington Avenue. Mihalik took over the business after his father relocated to Baldwin in a space almost double the size of the original store. Mihalik says initially he was not sure how he would use the additional space. "I didn't know how we were going to make a living."

Much of the business at the time included leftover merchandise and seconds from manufacturers. "I was selling leather jackets – they were seconds – for $20 to $25. In the '70s [and] early '80s, everything was still sold outdoors."

He credits much of his early success to advice given to him by his friend, Bobby Kutner, a former president of Jones New York. Kutner talked him into buying some designer clothing — Norma Kamali and Jones New York — at a discount, Mihalik recalls.

"I didn't know from labels. I was next to a chicken slaughtering house at the time. But it was a great deal. As soon as people heard I was selling Norma Kamali, we never looked back."

Another big break came when he became friends with Al Israel, then president of a company selling Armani. "Al told me to try selling some Armani men's samples. That gave me a real boost. Everybody began shopping here."

> Classic colours never go out of fashion

Tom's Place, now 12,000 square feet, has expanded to a space more than 10 times the size of the original Baldwin location. Today, it has 28 full-time and 10 part-time employees, among them, sale clerks, seamstresses, tailors and fabric buyers.

"We were one of the first stores to offer off-price designer merchandise," says Mihalik. "From a small beginning we built a big business. Today we do $10 million a year."

Spa Life

Port Hope's CAA Four Diamond rated Hillcrest Victorian Inn & Spa, 175 Dorset St. W. (1-888-346-6772) overlooking Lake Ontario, is the sister property of Ste. Anne's Country Inn & Spa in Grafton.

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

No need to pack much – upon arrival you are presented with a fluffy white robe and basically that is the only clothing you need till you leave.

"This is a destination spa; we pride ourselves in creating an entire experience for our guests," says Lori Copeland, marketing manager for the Hillcrest.

"Spa is the first thing we do here. It is our core business and everything else we offer compliments the spa,"she says. "We want our guests to escape, unwind and turn off."

The Hillcrest offers a full range of esthetic services, body work, massage therapy, hydrotherapy and exotic signature treatments such as the Physique Visage Absolute catering to both face and body using Dr. Hauschka Skin Care – a holistic product line from Germany used by celebrities Brad Pitt, Annette Benning and Madonna.

Services are only offered to overnight guests staying in one of the seven luxurious rooms in the 19th-century beaux arts-style Victorian manor.

"Our approach to wellness is based on stress management," Copeland says. "To get the full impact of the wellness benefits, we love for our guests to stay for a couple of nights, so they can really enjoy what we do here.

"We have a very intimate property here. At any given time we only have 16-20 people at the Hillcrest, making it feel more like a home."

One is the loneliest number when the wedding day isn't yours

By TERESA STRASSER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

To all the people who have invited me to events with those two fateful words, "and guest," I apologize.

I'm sorry you have to look through your wedding or shower or bar mitzvah photos and say, "Who's that?" when looking at my date.

It's a familiar question for me. In my defence, I'd like to say that at the time, it always seemed that "Mr. And Guest" is "The One," soon to be a permanent fixture in my life and my family. Is it my fault I'm either exceedingly optimistic or hopelessly misguided?

It's not like I intended to burden the world with my endless stream of McBoyfriends. I didn't mean to squeeze that extra platter of mass-produced salmon out of you. I never wanted to give you another mouth to feed, one you don't know or care to know.

It's just that it's no fun going solo.

Case in point: a wedding I once attended in Catalina, Calif. Sure, there were a couple possibilities in the "And Guest" pool, but none seemed close enough to bring. I couldn't handle the guilt, the photo review session, the "Who was that guy?"

I spent the weekend alone, a lone star in a galaxy of couples. All that beauty – the postcard blue ocean, the sailboats – seemed to mock me all weekend long.

> 'I'm beautiful, and you're not'

"Look at me," said the sunset. "I'm beautiful, you're not. Otherwise, you'd have an And Guest, you loser. Goodbye."

I woke up one morning that weekend with an early morning inner vortex of need, that stomach-twisting, "I need my mother or a good cup of coffee" feeling. I went and sat on the sidewalk with my cellphone and called home.

But those magic words "And Guest" have begun to disappear from my invitations. Throwing a big party is expensive, and who wants to foot the bill for someone's disposable guest? I completely understand.

According to the Internet etiquette specialists known as the Wedding Women, unless you're married, engaged or living with a boyfriend, it's not wrong or rude to make you go it alone.

"Sure, everyone has a better time when they're invited with a date, but many couples limit the number of guests by inviting co-habitating partners only," they advise.

Let's face it. Budgetary constraints aside, those wild card "And Guests" can add colour to any affair. Sometimes they're weird computer programmers, or scantily clad new girlfriends, or other gossip-worthy types that give everyone something to discuss. "And Guests" can really break up the monotony of socializing with the usual suspects, even if they are only begrudgingly welcome.

I have to be clear about one thing: it's not so bad to be single. I embrace it. I choose it. I'm not complaining. For now, that's just the way it is for many of us 20-somethings who are taking our time before co-habitating or marrying.

Still, think of us when you're debating whether or not to invite with guest. Picture us driving to an unfamiliar place all alone. Imagine us clutching a hard little dinner roll and scanning the room with a look of calm and confidence artificially etched on our faces. Picture us dancing with your six-year-old nephew because it's that or trade "How do you know the groom?" small talk with an accountant and his wife from Ohio.

Ultimately, it's just as rude to thrust some unwanted guest on a party-giver as it is to dispense with the feelings of single guests. I say, "Trust us." Give us the option of "And Guest" or "And Escort" and let us use our discretion to decide who would be appropriate. Sometimes, we'll mess up.

Trust me, we'll feel guilty about it. Mostly, though, we'll be able to enjoy your celebration more with someone in our corner.

Again, my apologies to anyone I've imposed upon. But the more I think about it, the less I feel bad.

Of all the etiquette advice I read online, I think my favourite was from a Town & Country Monthly article.

"While changing times have raised new questions about propriety, the very questions that will help you answer them, thoughtfulness, sensitivity, maturity are the same ones upon which strong marriages are built."

The article continues: "In the end, good old-fashioned manners, and kind hearts, can be the most reliable compass for navigating all questions of etiquette."

Isn't that well put? I thought so.

Funky jewelry is hip and foxy

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

It was on a car ride to the University of Western Ontario in 1998 that Jen Kluger and Suzie Orol planted the seeds for Foxy Originals, a line of funky jewelry that can be worn in multiple ways.

Kluger and Orol, both 24 and graduates of the school's Richard Ivey School of Business, began talking about their common passion for jewelry.

"We hadn't known each other until then," Kluger said. "The ride was fateful. Susie's family was involved in jewelry manufacturing, and we both had been designing our own jewelry. It was in both our bloods," said Kluger.

Coincidentally, she said,Orol had been in Paris and had come home with a floating bead necklace. "I had been making one. Our partnership was inevitable."

They began designing together, and by December of that year, they registered their name. "We named it Foxy after looking the word up in the dictionary. It means crafty and cunning; it fit us perfectly," said Orol.

They sold their work to fellow students, and then began approaching stores in London, Ont. "They were happy to take the jewelry and help support local students," she said.

Through their sales, they were able to obtain enough money to set up booths in festivals such as the Beaches arts and crafts show, Lilith Fair, the Toronto Pride Festival and the Canadian National Exhibition, as well as festivals in Oakville and Fort Erie.

"Our product and our price made our jewelry a hit. We were affordable so people could make impulse buys. We helped them choose pieces that went with their colouring, or we guided them in buying gifts; we put in that extra time. When you love a product yourself, other people love it," they said.

Selling in shows is a favourite part of their business, they said, because they are meeting their customers face to face. "There is something irreplaceable about selling your own product in public," said Kluger.

In 2001, they received the ACE Canada/CIBC Student Entrepreneur of the Year award, geared towards university students who were running a thriving business with unlimited growth potential.

"We were thrilled. Most of the others were Internet companies, so they recognized the growth potential of an innovative bricks and mortar business. It meant that Canada's business community had sanctified us," said Orol.

When they graduated in April 2002, they went into business full time, and now sell to more than 100 stores including Sporting Life, Over the Rainbow, Storm, Propaganda and the Muskoka Store, as well as on-line at Karmaloop.com.

"We still design all the jewelry ourselves, and before our last collection we ran a focus group so we could see what people wanted to wear.

"Our line stays true to our philosophy of being fun, fashionable and affordable. High quality, high fashion and low maintenance are key when we dream up new designs," said Orol.

Many pendants are reversible in order to offer two unique colour choices and contrasting looks, and "with prices ranging from $18 to $40, people can indulge without spending a fortune."

The jewelry, which is designed and manufactured in Toronto is a collection of reversible necklaces, lariats, belts, earrings and rings, made from pewter, and coated in sterling silver with a matte finish. "We also love to experiment with a variety of materials including enamel, faceted Czech glass stones, leather and ultra-suede.

"Our philosophy is to make high fashion jewelry accessible to young working women who do not have frivolous money to spend," they said.

Running their business, they said, is like running a three-ring circus. "We need to focus on sales, marketing, accounting and inventory, and we still design the jewelry. We love it, though."

They have big plans for themselves, they said. "We're going to New York and Los Angeles, and we have a sales representative in Quebec. This summer, we'll be in the Distillery District, the new arts and cultural centre with stores and coffee shops."

DJs are there to bring fun to your party

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

Like any performer in front of a crowd, DJs should be brimming with energy. Generally, up-tempo, fun parties involve the audience, get Zaidey out of his seat and find partygoers dancing their boredom away.

"If we're not having fun, then the crowd won't be having any fun," says Aaron Kaufman, president of Crown Entertainment (416-204-1900). The one-year-old entertainment company trains DJs from the bottom-up, only offering seasoned entertainers to pump up events. (Kaufman believes too many companies thrust 18-year-old DJs out into the industry.)

But can't bands do the same thing?

"A DJ provides creativity that a band can't replicate," Kaufman says. "The interactivity is very important, and a DJ has to make sure he keeps it fun and exciting."

Fun usually means dancing, and entertainment companies are often accompanied by dancers. For bar mitzvahs, Kaufman usually brings two dancers along with a DJ (and four "intelligent" lights). Crown is known for its customized dance move, the cha-cha slide – a nimble piece of footwork that includes seniors and youths alike.

For the kids at such events, dancing plays second fiddle to the music. Kaufman says every DJ should be knowledgeable about current music, and analyze how the crowd reacts to certain tunes.

Mike Benhaim, who DJs under the name Mikey B. for Spirit Entertainment (416-233-4499), says he can bring along 10,000 songs to please virtually any partygoer. DJs can also travel with a percussionist or a karaoke machine, as Benhaim does with Sing Your Heart Out. More popular as a booth-type entertainment, the karaoke addition allows singers to record their tunes on a VHS tape, at an extra $1,000 above the normal DJ costs.

Mickey B. and his partner Zev of Sing Your Heart Out.

About prices, Benhaim is surprised that clients still believe the days of the $500 DJ are still alive.

"People should be [more] suspicious of a company that doesn't charge enough than one that charges too much," he says, noting that an average 100-person-plus event costs a minimum of $2,500. Kaufman says his high-end events range from $2,400 to $4,500.

No matter the DJ's price, his enthusiasm should be contagious. "A DJ's first priority should be his energy," says Benhaim, a 15-year veteran.

"Each show has to be different," Kaufman says, adding that an accomplished DJ should be personable, open-minded and amusing.

But Benhaim points out that weddings call for a different character. "A wedding is more elegant. You don't want to see a DJ at the Four Seasons wearing a funny hat and a glow-in-the-dark bow tie."

Musical tastes differ, too. A bar mitzvah DJ can survive off top-40 and dance tunes, while a wedding requires a musical range from ballroom to swing to Sinatra. And a competent DJ will not only follow his client's playlist, but also gauge how the party reacts to the songs.

Jewish mystical texts reveal secrets of intercourse among married couples

By DR. RUTH WESTHEIMER and JONATHAN MARK

In the Jewish marriage ceremony, sexual satisfaction is part of the contract. Under the wedding canopy, a groom promises his bride that he will provide her with comfortable standards of food, shelter and sexual gratification. The holiest men are required to marry. Celibacy is not a virtue; orgasms are.

Judaism is intensely sexual. The medieval rabbi Ramban, or Nachmanides, taught in Igeret Hakodesh, The Holy Letter: "When sexual intercourse is done for the sake of heaven, there is nothing so holy and pure. God did not create anything that is ugly or shameful. If the sexual organs are said to be shameful, how can it be said that the Creator fashioned something blemished?"

Adds the Zohar, the main Jewish mystical text: "The divine Presence rests on the marital bed when both male and female are united in love and holiness. After the destruction of the Jerusalem Temple, the bedroom in each home was considered as an aspect of the once glorious and sanctified Holy of Holies."

There's a story in the Talmud about a rabbi, known simply as Rav, who was having sex with his wife on Friday night after a very good Shabbat meal, when he suddenly had a strange feeling that there was a third person in the room.

He got up, looked behind the curtain, in the closet, under the bed, and lo and behold, there was his favourite student, Rabbi Kahana, hiding under the bedsprings.

Rav said, "Is this proper behaviour, for a yeshiva boy to be under the rabbi's bed while the rabbi performs the mitzvah of intercourse?"

The yeshiva boy answered: "Rabbi, what you are doing is a mitzvah from the Torah, and I must learn from you!"

What is interesting here is Judaism's braiding of sexual openness and sexual modesty. The yeshiva boy convinces the rabbi that his audacity is legitimate because knowing how to perform intercourse is a legitimate part of his religious and spiritual education. Nevertheless, the boy understands that he must hide.

This dialectic is ongoing, not only within the tradition, but within each of us who seeks to balance our need for modesty and privacy with our need for sexual education.

Sex, in and of itself, has never been a sin for Jews, nor has it been something not to discuss. Within Sinai's conventional boundaries, it is a mitzvah, or religious commandment. And what is a mitzvah except a blessing, or a guide on how our lives can be more heavenly?

In the Jewish tradition, sex is very much in the eye of the beholder, in the mind where a healthy approach to sex made good sex possible for Jews in the most trying of circumstances and situations.

As the Talmud teaches us in tractate Sanhedrin: If a man and a woman are truly lovers, they can make their bed on the edge of the sword; if their love goes bad, the best bed in the world is not big enough.

Quality, professional DJing takes time and skill

The DJ agreed and predictably the party died whenever the rap music blared. The DJ decided to switch the rap off, and played some dance-friendly tunes, and some rock, and the guests began to dance. But the boy stormed up to the DJ and shouted for more rap music. The DJ agreed (since the parents went along with their child's wishes) and the 40 kids at the party left the dance floor to loiter outside.

That amateur DJ should have changed tactics, Benhaim says, even if his playlist only demanded rap music.

"You can choose a menu for a caterer, but you don't tell him how to cook the food," Benhaim remarks.

"DJing takes times and skill, and it's a recipe for disaster if you grab your neighbour's kid and tell him to play CDs."

That kind of money-saving tactic will likely result in seated and silent guests, a DJ's nightmare.

Even before a client buys a DJ's time, Kaufman suggests collecting as many free price quotes as possible. Although a company's name may sound reputable, don't always rely on star power, he says. In this competitive industry, there is incentive to sell bigger parties but don't go over a budget because of company pressure.

In the end, though, a DJ has to be a party consultant, a one-night minister of fine arts. If the music pumps with the same energy as the dancers and the DJ's attitude, then you should feel like you can rock 'n' roll all night and party every day.

Message from Jonathan Wener

As outgoing President, it is my duty and honour to review the accomplishments of the JGH during the past three years. Before I begin, I must say that it has been my privilege to work with an amazingly committed and professional group of people who have dedicated themselves with such passion to the treatment and wellness of our population.

Every success we achieved was the result of a focused, talented and high-energy team, tirelessly overcoming obstacles and working through challenges together, never losing sight of our goals.

Accomplishments:

- It was my responsibility to chair our new five-year strategic plan that set forth the objectives, goals and aspirations of our hospital. This thoughtful, inclusive and thorough process was designed to seek and integrate the points of view of all interest groups in the hospital in order to create a comprehensive plan that everyone would support. The outcome was an unprecedented enthusiasm and high level of cooperation by our doctors, nurses, administration and healthcare professionals who participated in defining priorities, and guided us in meeting the plan's numerous objectives. One of the most significant results of our efforts to date, which gave me great personal satisfaction, was the endorsement of the Comprehensive Cancer Centre Program across all disciplines. We have an extraordinary concentration of clinical oncological scientists and are moving towards a designation by the province of Quebec as a Comprehensive Cancer Centre.
- Due to the ongoing financial reality of running a high calibre, public institution, one of our first objectives was to expand our capital base. We immediately put emphasis on areas where we could obtain relatively quick increases in revenue to fund the many programs operating in the hospital. Revenue generation has increased from $935,911 in 1999 to $1,752,000 at the end of 2002. This was done under the capable leadership of Paul Lowenstein in conjunction with an active committee. We commend Paul and his team for their dedication and willingness to dwell on each and every area to ensure we maximize revenue wherever possible, and at the same time, improve services. This committee's continuous drive for

New President elected

The hospital is pleased to announce that Mr. Stanley K. Plotnick has been elected President of the Centre Board for a two-year term, effective June 2003.

Having served as Vice-President of the hospital and as a member of the Foundation Board, Mr. Plotnick is familiar with the challenges, strengths and achievements of the Jewish General Hospital, and excited by the opportunity to lead the hospital through what promises to be a period of unprecedented growth and development.

"The Jewish General Hospital is an outstanding health care institution – one of the best in Canada," states Mr. Plotnick. His goals are to continue the hospital's distinguished tradition of striving for excellence in patient care, academia and research. More specifically, in the next few years, special emphasis will be placed on the establishment of a Comprehensive Cancer Centre Program—the first of its kind in the province—and the development of a modern Cardiovascular Sciences Centre. "We remain committed to providing compassionate, first rate care to our patients and to improving the working environment for our outstanding physicians, nurses, professional and support staff," he adds.

Stanley K. Plotnick has a distinguished history of volunteerism, both within the Montreal Jewish community and the broader community. The many leadership positions he has held include Past President of Federation CJA, the Jewish Education Council of Greater Montreal, and Solomon Schechter Academy, Founder and Co-Chairman of Pro Montreal, Editor-in-Chief of InMontreal magazine, Chairman of the 10th Anniversary Special Gala of the Gala des Étoiles and Chairman of the March of the Living.

His commitment to the welfare of others has been recognized with numerous awards including the Distinguished Leadership Award from Federation CJA, and the Outstanding Montrealers Award from the State of Israel Bonds. In May 2002, Mr. Plotnick was the Honoree at the Jewish National Fund Negev Dinner.

Mr. Plotnick is President of AVS Technologies, a company that designs, develops, imports and distributes consumer electronic products. He is a graduate of both McGill University and the Sloan School of Management, Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

A McGill University Teaching Hospital

People in the News

Congratulations to Dr. Saul Frenkiel, who was appointed Chairman of the Department of Otolaryngology at McGill University. This appointment, which followed a nation-wide search and selection process, includes an appointment as Chief of the Department of Otolaryngology at the McGill University Health Centre.

Dr. Frenkiel, who has been Chief of the JGH Department of Otolaryngology since 1992, is a specialist in rhinology and endoscopic sinus surgery. Under his leadership, the department has built upon its expertise in all aspects of otolaryngology including head and neck surgery. A professor in the McGill University Faculty of Medicine, Dr. Frenkiel is dedicated to the practice and promotion of academic medicine and has been voted Best Teacher by students in the McGill Department of Otolaryngology.

Dr. Frenkiel is the author of over 150 publications, including peer-reviewed journal articles, textbook chapters and multi-media works. He has been an invited lecturer and presenter at many national and international conferences, where he has presented the results of his work in the subspecialties of nasal and sinus surgery, nasal airflow testing and the molecular biology of chronic sinusitis.

A warm welcome as well to Dr. Martin Gyger of the Division of Hematology. An associate professor of Medicine at McGill University, Dr. Gyger is Director of our hospital's Stem Cell Transplantation Program and Director of the Apheresis Unit. Dr. Gyger specializes in hematopoietic stem cell transplantation, a relatively simple, painless procedure that does not require surgery or hospitalization. In patients suffering from Hodgkin's or non-Hodgkin's lymphoma, the procedure has a 30-50% success rate. His primary research interest is non myeloablative allogeneic stem cell transplantation. This procedure, which is more complicated and carries with it the risk of rejection, involves transplanting bone marrow from a relative (usually a sibling), and is reserved for patients whose own stem cells are too contaminated.

We welcome Dr. Walter Gotlieb, who recently joined the hospital's Department of Obstetrics and Gynecology. Dr. Gotlieb, who is an Associate Professor at McGill University, has the distinction of being the first gynaecologic oncologist at the Jewish General Hospital. (There are only 1000 such specialists world-wide.) Gynaecologic cancers include cancer of the vulva, vagina, uterus, cervix and ovaries.

After earning his medical degree in his native Belgium, Dr. Gotlieb spent six years pursuing subspecialty training in the United States, at both the National Institutes of Health and the University of California at Los Angeles. He was then recruited by Tel Hashomer Hospital in Israel, where he founded and developed the department of gynaecologic-oncology.

It was the challenge of doing the same here, combined with our hospital's advanced translational research capability, that attracted Dr. Gotlieb to the Jewish General Hospital. In fact, his primary research interest is in developing new treatments that are based on genetic engineering, particularly for ovarian cancers.

"My goals are to provide specialized services to patients with gynaecologic cancers as well as access to new, innovative and improved treatment options," Dr. Gotlieb explains.

Congratulations to Kotiel Berdugo who has been appointed Director of Technical Services. "My goals are to raise the quality standards of the division's services, improve the physical facilities of the patient care units and to efficiently manage the many different expansion projects within the hospital," he explains.

The Division of Technical Services at the JGH consists of the following departments: Maintenance, Security, Housekeeping, Laundry, Mail Room, Purchasing, Telecommunications, Central Supply and Boiler Room. The division is also responsible for overseeing all of the various renovation projects throughout the hospital, consulting with staff members to understand their needs, supervising architects, contractors and other specialists, and ensuring that projects are completed on time and on budget.

Reaching out to the greater Montreal community, guests were given a unique opportunity to talk with leading physicians, surgeons, researchers, department heads and other medical personnel of the JGH about the current state of medicine and their goals for the future.

The campaign demonstrates our combined determination to take the Jewish General Hospital to new levels of medical service, patient care and research. Emphasis was drawn to the four "pillars" being addressed: the Comprehensive Cancer Centre Program, the Cardiovascular Sciences Centre, the expansion of the Lady Davis Institute for Medical Research and department enhancement and support.

The multi-media event featured presentations that highlighted critical hospital needs, departmental profile brochures and the premiere of the "You Have the Power to Heal" campaign video.

The campaign team, championed by Morton Brownstein and Edward Wiltzer, clearly elucidated the substantial dollars needed to build this hospital for the future—a need that requires the recruitment and retention of top-notch professionals, additional and renovated space, facilities and equipment, and the expansion of our overcrowded research facility. While the campaign's goals are ambitious, indeed, they accurately reflect the real needs of a first class medical institution in this, our 21st century.

The message is clear—our number one commitment at the Jewish General Hospital is to provide patients with quality care that meets the highest standards. The generosity of our donors will ensure that our commitment is fulfilled.

Multidisciplinary care

— the key to recovery

As anyone who has ever been hospitalized is aware, recovery from serious illness or injury often requires input from a team of health care professionals, each with his or her own area of expertise. In this issue of the JGH News, we shine a spotlight on a handful of allied health care professionals—well-trained, highly skilled individuals who, working as part of a multidisciplinary team, are dedicated to helping patients regain their strength, health and autonomy.

Speech therapy

Imagine the frustration of knowing the words in your head but being unable to formulate them verbally so that you can express your needs, thoughts and ideas. This is a common challenge for stroke patients and by extension, their families.

"The goal is to train the brain to compensate for deficits while building on the skills that patients have retained," explains speech pathologist Lisa Hargraves, a member of the JGH Stroke Team. This team, coordinated by nurse Marie-Ann Yang, provides a holistic approach to patient care—an approach that research has shown to be extremely beneficial for patients.

The Department of Audiology and Speech Language Pathology consists of four speech pathologists and four audiologists. They work virtually everywhere in the hospital and have a major presence in medicine, neurology, oncology and the head and neck and otolaryngology services.

Speech pathologist Lisa Hargraves conducts a swallowing evaluation with patient Rose Tannenbaum.

When meeting patients for the first time, Ms. Hargraves conducts thorough swallowing, language and speech assessments. Swallowing disorders, also known as dysphagia, are a common side effect of stroke and must be assessed immediately. This condition is potentially fatal, as patients who cannot properly protect their airways are in danger of choking or aspirating food or liquid into the lungs. Ms. Hargraves tests patients' oral pharyngeal functioning by providing them with different consistencies of food and liquids to see what they are able to tolerate. During the course of their stay in the hospital, she will continuously monitor their progress, upgrading the consistency of food as their ability to swallow improves.

"There is a lack of knowledge about swallowing disorders among the general public," notes Ms. Hargraves. "That's why it's important to provide patients and families with lots of education about safe eating strategies and compensatory techniques."

Language and speech assessments are also important. "Usually, there is an overlap between speech and language difficulties, but it is possible to have one without the other. It depends on the extent of the damage and the location of the stroke in the brain," Ms. Hargraves explains. A language assessment evaluates the patient's ability to comprehend and express language, often including an evaluation of reading and writing ability. Speech assessment involves checking for difficulties with articulation and voice production. Here again, patient and family education is important.

Once the assessments are completed, Ms. Hargraves works closely with the patient and family, teaching them techniques to enhance communication. These include communicating in a calm and quiet environment free of distractions, giving information to patients in smaller pieces so that they can process and absorb it more easily and incorporating non-verbal methods of communication such as using gestures, visual aids and other tactile cues.

Occupational therapy

"As an occupational therapist, my goal is to help people regain the skills they need to live independent and productive lives," explains Gabi Rosberger, who specializes in occupational therapy for the geriatric population. Examples of skills that we take for granted include walking, getting dressed, bathing and cooking.

Studies show that it often takes patients longer to recover their functional autonomy than it does to recover from the illness that necessitated hospitalization. "The connection between autonomy and overall health is not always clear to patients and their families. Incapacity is not an inevitable part of aging," notes Ms. Rosberger. Consequently, education—of families as well as staff—is an essential component of her work.

An occupational therapy consultation begins with a review of the patient's history, medical chart and interviews with the patient, family and caregiver(s). Functional and cognitive evaluations are designed to determine what the patient is capable of doing and what his or her maximum level of functional autonomy was prior to the current illness. Home visits, in the presence of caregivers or family members whenever possible, provide the occupational therapist with the opportunity to assess the patient's skills and identify any deficits in terms of everyday living. "Sometimes, small alterations to the home environment are all that is necessary to help caregivers maintain the patient's safety," Ms. Rosberger explains.

Occupational therapists also recommend and make adaptive aids to facilitate autonomy. These include adaptations for more effective seating and positioning of the elderly to prevent bedsores and skin breakdown, orthotics such as splints and slings, and special aids to maximize the patient's independence in self care activities.

Interdisciplinary collaboration is an integral part of the philosophy of the Division of Geriatrics. "We are all partners who rely on each other's expertise," says Ms. Rosberger. "Our biggest ally is the family and it's our job to help family members create a comfortable and safe environment where the patient will function at the highest possible level of autonomy."

Six occupational therapists work throughout the hospital, with a particularly active presence in the Division of Geriatrics and the Department of Psychiatry. In addition to providing services to patients, the Department of Occupational Therapy provides staff with ergonomic consultations upon referral, to help minimize the risk of injury.

Social work

In North America, there is a tendency to view new parenthood as a happy and beautiful time coupled with an unwillingness to accept that the birth of an infant can be a cause of great stress. When problems do arise, when women and men exhibit difficulty adjusting to their new role as parents, when high-risk psychosocial issues threaten to endanger the safety of infants, social worker Deborah Cobrin steps in to assess the situation, help smooth the transition to parenthood, make recommendations, develop action plans, and, when necessary, contact the CLSC and/or Youth Protection.

"My first priority is the well-being of the infant, and I try to be available to help parents with their concerns," states Ms. Cobrin. "I'm fortunate that the nursing team on the Maternal Child Health Unit and in the Neonatal Intensive Care Unit are very attuned to social issues and respect my expertise in this area," she continues.

Recruited to the hospital's Lady Davis Institute for Medical Research in 1995, Dr. Richard is a project director in both the Terry Fox Molecular Oncology Group and the Bloomfield Centre for Research on Aging. As well, he is an Associate Professor at McGill University. His research interest is concentrated on two areas: cancer and multiple sclerosis (MS). More specifically, he discovered proteins that are implicated in each of these diseases.

Recognized as an outstanding young scientist, Dr. Richard was responsible for identifying a novel nuclear structure in cancer cells, called sam68, that appears to correlate with how malignant a tumour is. In an experiment using 200 breast cancer cells stained with the sam68 antibody, he found that approximately 30% of the cells have this nuclear body. "This may help in grading tumours, which is important because accurate diagnosis often leads to more precise, effective treatment," explains Dr. Richard. Scientists greeted the publication of his paper in Molecular Biology of the Cell (1999) with great enthusiasm, and he was awarded the Young Investigator Award as a result of this work.

In the area of MS, Dr. Richard is studying a gene related to the sam68 protein that exists in quaking mice—so named because they lack myelin, the protective covering of the central nervous system (the brain and spinal cord). MS is an autoimmune disease in which the body's own immune system malfunctions, attacking the myelin and often destroying it in patches. The disease is especially prevalent in northern latitudes and countries like Canada that are farther away from the equator.

Through his research, published in the journal Neuron (2002), Dr. Richard has demonstrated that the quaking proteins are directly involved in the process of myelination. The next step, which he is now examining, is to try to use the quaking protein to stimulate myelination (a process called remyelination). "This can potentially lead to the development of an effective strategy for treating MS and reversing its debilitating effects," notes Dr. Richard.

A native of Montreal, Dr. Richard completed his B.Sc. in Biochemistry and Ph.D. in the Division of Experimental Medicine at McGill University. He completed post-doctoral training in a unique program that combined industrial and academic experience at Pfizer in Connecticut and Washington University in St. Louis, considered the Harvard of the Midwest. Focusing on immunology and the signaling process, it was here that he discovered the sam68 protein. "Working in both worlds—industry and academia—was a unique experience that gave me a good understanding of the needs and challenges in each of these environments," Dr. Richard says.

When he was offered a position at the LDI and the opportunity to be part of the faculty of McGill, he was excited by the chance to return to Montreal. In addition to the award from the National Cancer Institute of Canada, Dr. Richard was recently named a William Dawson Scholar by McGill University. This award recognizes junior professors for their outstanding achievements in research and academia.

Neurosurgeon establishes links with colleagues in China

In the fall of 2002, Dr. Gérard Mohr, Chief of the Division of Neurosurgery, spent two weeks in China, where he was an invited guest lecturer at the Beijing Neurosurgical Institute as well as visiting professor and guest lecturer at the First Guangzhou International Neuro-Oncology Meeting.

The invitation to the latter had an interesting Jewish General Hospital connection—it was organized by Professor Chen Zhong Ping, who was a research fellow at our hospital's Lady Davis Institute for Medical Research from 1993 1999, and is now Chairman of Neurosurgery at the Sun Yat-Sen Cancer Hospital in Guangzhou.

Overall, Dr. Mohr was extremely impressed by the modern and spacious treatment facilities he visited, all equipped with the latest technology and staffed by highly skilled, knowledgeable neurosurgeons and support staff. The Beijing Neurosurgical Institute, for example, is a 330-bed hospital with 18 operating rooms, where 95 neurosurgeons provide treatment in 10 distinct neurosurgical services including skull base, cerebrovascular, pediatrics and spine surgery. While visiting China, Dr. Mohr discovered that the country's health system appears to be undergoing major changes, with a private system being introduced alongside the public one.

"I was able to establish valuable contacts which will allow us to exchange fellows and possibly scholars as well as to collaborate on various research projects including epidemiology of brain tumors and minimally invasive endoscopic skull base surgery," Dr. Mohr noted. In fact, this July, Dr. Gong will arrive from China to undertake a one-year fellowship in image guided endoscopic pituitary microsurgery under the supervision of Dr. Mohr.

Surgical Education Resource Room

Since it opened in December 2002, the newly created Surgical Education Resource Room, dedicated to Dr. Harvey Sigman, has been a hit with surgical residents, medical students and surgeons.

Featuring the latest in multimedia and presentation equipment as well as educational resources such as videos describing current surgical techniques, and computer equipment for on-line searches (linked to the Health Sciences Library), this resource room encourages self-study and the preparation of case presentations. Teaching rounds are also held here.

"Our goal is to foster educational fervor in our medical students and residents as well as ourselves," explains Dr. Anna Derossis, Director of Surgical Education. "In an era where ambulatory care has changed the face of surgical practice, where techniques are rapidly evolving and where evidence-based practice is the norm, we need to provide our students with a conducive learning environment equipped with the necessary resources," she adds.

At a special dedication of the room, Dr. Harvey Sigman, Chief of the Division of General Surgery, was honoured for his longstanding commitment to medical and surgical education. In speaking about Dr. Sigman, Dr. Bernard Shapiro, O.C., former Principal and Vice-Chancellor of McGill University noted that, "…he teaches us all what it is to be clever, knowledgeable, modest and empathetic… We, his colleagues, are lucky to have him as a model of quiet yet supremely competent integrity."

Also at the dedication, Dr. Martin Black, Chief of the Department of Surgery, announced the appointment of Dr. Anna Derossis as Director of Surgical Education at the hospital as well as the formation of a committee to address educational issues in surgery. Since joining the JGH in October 2001, one of Dr. Derossis' first priorities was the creation of this educational resource room. An Assistant Professor of Surgery and Oncology at McGill University, Dr. Derossis completed a master's degree in medical education and then obtained specialty training in breast surgery.

Helping Children Cope With Death

Pablo Pearl A. Gradinger

In a misguided effort to shield children from pain, they are often not included in discussions about death, noted psychologist Dr. Judy Gradinger and Child Psychiatry Head Nurse Rosemary Short in an informative Nursing Grand Rounds presentation entitled Discussing Death With Children. Both emphasized that children need to be told about death, with explanations that are clear, honest, straightforward and appropriate to their chronological age.

Children of all ages tend to be egocentric and concerned about their own emotional needs and sense of security. They require reassurance that their needs will be met and should be encouraged to express their emotions and to mourn.

Often, however, when parents are preoccupied with their own grief and other serious issues, they neglect to include children in these discussions. After the age of five, the child should attend the funeral, but someone who is not a chief mourner should be assigned to sit with the child and take care of him or her. "A child who is denied the opportunity to say goodbye at the funeral or the cemetery will feel even more abandoned," Dr. Gradinger explained.

Very young children (age 3-6) in particular, take things literally. They also have no sense of time and think that death is reversible. Therefore, euphemisms such as "passed on" or "went to Heaven" should be avoided because to a young child, this sounds like their relative went on a trip and will return. Children can be told that when people die, they can't think, feel, walk or talk.

While older children (age 6-9) begin to understand the finality of death, they may also fear that death is contagious or that even a healthy parent will soon die. Anger at being abandoned, guilt at having wished ill on someone in the heat of the moment, and grief are common emotions among children age 9-12, whose schoolwork may also suffer. "It is very important for children to understand that they were not responsible for the death of a relative," Dr. Gradinger stressed.

Teenagers also feel anger and guilt but may try to cover up their emotions. Just because they are hanging out with friends and seem to be fine doesn't mean that they are not suffering, noted Dr. Gradinger. Teenagers who do not get help with their feelings may indulge in risk-taking behaviour.

While expressions of anger and sadness are common, children who exhibit the following behaviours for several months after the death of a loved one may require professional help: persistent difficulty talking about the dead parent, aggressive behaviour, anxiety in the form of behaviours such as excessive clinging to the surviving parent or phobias about going to school, sleeping difficulties and/or persistent nightmares, eating disturbances, marked social withdrawal, school difficulties or serious academic reversal, persistent self blame or guilt, self destructive behaviour or expressing a desire to die.

HOPE & COPE

Denim & Diamonds

Sponsored by Parasuco Jeans and organized by the Young Adult Division, the Denim & Diamonds bash raised $75,000 for the hospital.

Each year, a portion of the proceeds raised at the Linda Saab Golf Tournament is generously donated to Hope & Cope, a cancer support program based at the hospital. Pictured here, tournament organizers Charlie Belozian (left) and Mel Peress (right) present a cheque to Hope & Cope President Susan Polisuk and Chairman Sheila Kussner.

Headed by oncologist and cancer researcher Dr. Michael Pollak, the CPC provides specialized, up-to-date information and resources to the public, and is committed to advancing research efforts in the field of cancer prevention. With affiliated experts in all of the major medical and surgical disciplines, including Associate Director Dr. Michael Dworkind, the CPC offers practical medical, lifestyle, dietary and screening advice to teach about ways to reduce the risk of developing certain forms of cancer.

Through its medical and counselling services, the CPC staff informs patients about the genetic risks of developing cancer and provides referrals for appropriate screening tests. Smoking cessation, nutrition programs and lifestyle recommendations to reduce the risk of cancer are also offered.

The Cancer Prevention Centre is located in Room C-107, and can be reached by calling 340-8222, extension 4947.

Research shows that within the first six weeks post-partum, 40% of mothers report problems with breastfeeding. The newly established Goldfarb Breastfeeding Program in the Herzl Family Practice is an innovative clinic that provides new and expecting mothers with information, guidance and coaching about breastfeeding.

Generously supported through a donation by Robert and Lenore Goldfarb, the program is the brainchild of Dr. Perle Feldman. "Most doctors know that breastfeeding is good," says Dr. Feldman. "But they haven't learned how to manage and treat breastfeeding problems." While other breastfeeding programs exist in Montreal, this is the only one to have the involvement of physicians. One of its main objectives is to increase the knowledge and skills of family medicine, pediatrics and obstetrics residents. In addition to Dr. Feldman, the program is staffed by lactation consultants Carole Dobrich and Lenore Goldfarb as well as three obstetrics fellows.

At the official launch, Lenore Goldfarb shared her personal experience and motivation for supporting the program. Although her child was being carried by a surrogate mother, she was determined to breastfeed. After contacting Dr. Jack Newman, a Toronto based pediatrician and world-renowned breastfeeding specialist, she agreed to go on a protocol to induce lactation. She subsequently breastfed her son successfully for 8 months, went on to co-author a guide entitled "The Protocols for Induced Lactation: A Guide for Maximizing Breastmilk Production," and took courses at the Lactation Institute in California. Thanks to the assistance of Dr. Feldman and Carole Dobrich, she was able to complete her practical training and receive certification to become a licensed lactation consultant.

The Goldfarb Breastfeeding Program is open by appointment Mondays, Wednesdays and Thursdays from 9:00 a.m. to noon. A drop-in breast-feeding support group is held on Tuesdays from 1:30 p.m. to 3:30 p.m. Appointments can be made by calling 340-8253.

JGH hosts Jewish Chamber of Commerce power breakfast

On April 30th, approximately 60 young businesspeople from the Jewish Chamber of Commerce (JCC) gathered at the Sir Mortimer B. Davis – Jewish General Hospital (JGH) for a power breakfast.

Justin Vineberg, Co-Chairman of the JCC, said that the objective of the organization is to provide its members with networking and outreach opportunities.

Hospital President Jonathan Wener compared the hospital, with a budget of $200 million (including research grants), to the economy of a small city. He spoke about the business of the JGH, the recent introduction of successful revenue generation ventures, and future business opportunities. "As the greatest gift of the Jewish community to Quebec, the hospital is about take-home value. There is a direct relationship between input and output, and if you offer your time and your expertise, you will find it a very satisfying experience," concluded Mr. Wener.

Executive Director Henri Elbaz spoke about the hospital's results-oriented management philosophy and practice. He explained that the goal is to achieve and preserve high standards in the three axes of the hospital — patient care, teaching and research — and to do so in a fiscally responsible manner. "As one of the most important and most efficient hospitals in Quebec, we constantly evaluate patients' needs and integrate quality issues into every meeting and every process," he noted.

Dr. Marc Afilalo, Chief of the Emergency Department described how the hospital resolved the overcrowding crisis that still exists in many emergency rooms, not only in Quebec, but throughout the world. Treating an average of 170 patients per day, many of whom have complex medical problems, the JGH Emergency Department is one of the busiest in Montreal. "Our goal is to treat patients in a dignified and humane way. The key to our success is teamwork — within the Emergency Department itself, with other medical departments and our Department of Nursing, and with the Board and the Administration, who made solving the overcrowding crisis a top priority," said Dr. Afilalo.

The breakfast was followed by tours of the Emergency Department, led by ER physicians Drs. Stephen Rosenthal, Richard Kohn and Willis Grad.

Mr. Berdugo first joined the JGH in 1994 as Chief of the Boiler Room, a position he held for five years. From 1999-2002, he was in charge of Plant Operations and Maintenance. His responsibilities included supervising and managing all phases of construction and renovation projects from the initial conceptualization to finalization. Examples include the installation of a linear accelerator and the expansion of the Neurology Division. He is particularly proud of three energy conservation projects he initiated, all of which were self-financing. In fact, these projects, which saved the hospital a total of $7.5 million, recently won the Prix d' excellence en gestion de l'efficacité énergétique from the Association of Quebec Hospitals.

After completing his Master's degree in applied sciences (mathematics) from the Université Paul Sabatier de Toulouse in France, Mr. Berdugo graduated from Ecole Polytechnique (Université de Montréal) with a Bachelor's in Mechanical Engineering. He later completed additional studies, earning a post-graduate diploma in management from the Ecole des Hautes Etudes Commerciales de Montréal. Prior to joining the JGH, he worked as a factory engineer at Peerless Electric and a project engineer at Racan-Carrier Co.

Training lab scientists

Drs. George Chong and Elizabeth MacNamara are doing their part to train the next generation of laboratory scientists. As part of the Canadian Genetic Diseases Network (CDGN)/ Institute of Genetics, CIHR funded program called "Gene Researcher for a Week", they welcomed Ms. Audrey Dussereault, a CEGEP student from Lennoxville, Quebec, who was one of the 16 lucky students chosen out of 330 applicants to this Canada-wide program. Dr. Will Foulkes, JGH Director of the Program in Cancer Genetics, and a principal investigator of the CDGN commented,

"This will be a great opportunity for Audrey to experience molecular genetic diagnosis as it actually happens in the hospital, with real live DNA samples being tested for mutations in important cancer-related genes."

Dr. Foulkes also arranged for Audrey to spend time in the Molecular Diagnostic Laboratory.

Managing Menopause

This article is based on two lectures that took place in March 2003. The first of these was a public lecture entitled "Sex After Menopause and Hormone Replacement Therapy", featuring Dr. Wulf Utian, Executive Director of the North American Menopause Society, and Dr. Laurie Betito, sex therapist and psychologist, organized by the JGH Department of Obstetrics and Gynecology in conjunction with the Quebec Section of the American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists. The second was a lecture sponsored by the Auxiliary's Roslyn Liebling Memorial Body & Soul Health Series, featuring Dr. Louise Miner, an obstetrician-gynecologist and Director of Obstetrical Ultrasound at the JGH.

The average age of menopause, defined as the cessation of menses, is 51. Perimenopause includes the period that begins from 2-8 years preceding menopause and the first year after the final menstrual period.

Perimenopause is characterized by fluctuating hormone levels, irregular cycles and the onset of symptoms that may increase as menopause approaches. Symptoms can include hot flashes and night sweats, insomnia, emotional unrest, skin aging and dryness, short-term memory problems and decreased sexual desire. Not all women are affected to the same degree. For example, while 85% of women report having hot flashes, this symptom is severe enough to cause major difficulties with sleep and daily activities in only 15% of these women.

Experts agree that lifestyle factors can play an important role in minimizing the severity of symptoms as well as delaying and/or preventing the onset of health problems. According to Dr. Louise Miner, the perimenopausal period is an ideal time for women to develop a healthy lifestyle. Regular exercise, maintaining a healthy weight, quitting smoking, cutting back on alcohol and caffeine, controlling cholesterol levels, hypertension and diabetes, are all essential. It is a little known yet startling fact that consumption of two or more alcoholic drinks per day increases the risk of breast cancer by 60%. By the same token, less than four hours of exercise per week also substantially increases the risk of breast cancer.

As Dr. Miner explained, there are alternatives to hormone therapy that many women have found helpful in alleviating symptoms of menopause. In addition to lifestyle changes mentioned above, strategies include drinking cool water during hot flashes, dressing in layers, using moisturizers and lubricants, keeping a regular sleep schedule, and engaging in relaxing activities such as yoga and meditation. Short-term use of St. John's Wort for mild to moderate depression as well as conventional antidepressants also can be helpful.

The controversy and confusion surrounding hormone replacement therapy (HRT) has caused fear and panic, acknowledged Dr. Wulf Utian, Executive Director of the North American Menopause Society. The decision as to whether to prescribe hormones is based on several factors including an individualized risk assessment for every patient (based on family history and lifestyle factors), the current recommendations in the medical literature, the severity of symptoms and the patient's own wishes. "Selected medications can be prescribed to specific women based on a risk-benefit assessment," explained Dr. Utian.

Short-term hormonal replacement therapy (four years or less) to alleviate specific symptoms of menopause, as opposed to HRT for prevention, is considered safe. HRT has many benefits including protection from osteoporosis, the alleviation of hot flashes, a reduced risk of colorectal cancer, and a reduced risk of developing Alzheimer's disease (although it will not slow down the progression of this disease if it has already started). Dr. Miner noted that HRT should be avoided by women with a strong family history of breast cancer (mother, sister, aunt), serious heart, liver or kidney disease and/or a strong family history of blood clots or thrombophilias. "In consultation with their gynecologists, women should reassess the need for HRT on an annual basis and when new medical information becomes available," suggested Dr. Miner.

Two winners: Domenic Diaco and the Comprehensive Cancer Centre Program

Domenic Diaco, Senior Manager, Global Solutions with RBC Investments, set out to accomplish two goals: to earn the Gold Level – coureur des bois in the Canadian Ski Marathon and to raise money for the JGH Comprehensive Cancer Centre Program.

Undaunted by the cold and a grueling two-day course, Domenic earned the Gold Level and raised close to $6000 in sponsorships.

What an achievement!
Congratulations.

Campaign online

With the capital campaign in full swing, prospective donors and canvassers can log onto the "You Have the Power to Heal" website for complete information on the campaign and the Sir Mortimer B. Magda Freundlich, JGH gift planner

Mrs. Magda Freundlich recently informed the Foundation that she has made a bequest in her will to benefit the hospital. As well, so that the hospital can benefit from her generosity today, she dedicated a plaque, to be located in the hospital's chapel, in memory of her late husband, Emanuel. Magda and her husband, originally from Romania, arrived in Canada in 1954, learned a new language, worked hard and created their life together in their adopted country. They always believed in helping others. "It is the right thing to do and besides, it feels good," explains Magda.

Mrs. Freundlich wanted to show her appreciation for the excellent care, kindness and compassion her late husband received at the JGH.

"Although I am not rich, I wanted to be sure that a part of our hard earned savings would be put to good use. I know that the hospital needs the money and will use it wisely."

Anyone can be a JGH Gift Planner. For more information on gift planning options, please contact Beverly Kravitz, Director of Planned Giving, at the Foundation office 340-8222, extension 4123.

Research Governors Society 2003 lecture series

The Research Governors Society started off the 2003 lecture series for its members on May 21st. Drs. J. Enrique Silva, Andrew C. Karaplis and Alicia Schiffrin spoke on "Endocrinology: Directions for a Better Life & Disease Prevention". The lecture was preceded by optional tours of the laboratories of Drs. Mark Trifiro and Andrew C. Karaplis.

You can become a member of the Research Governors Society (annual donation of $250 or more) by calling Cindy Hershon at 340-8222, local 2235.

An evening in Athens

The JGH Hellenic Committee, under the leadership of Mrs. Sophia Demetelin, is undertaking to raise money to renovate the Nuclear Medicine Division. Plans are underway for a gala to be held on October 26, 2003, an evening of dining and dancing. Mrs. Demetelin, well known in the Hellenic community, says, "The JGH has provided outstanding care and support to the Hellenic community and it is only fitting that the Hellenic community shows its support to the hospital".

For further information, please contact Mrs. Sophia Demetelin at (514) 739-5263 or Larry Sidel, 340-8251.

HOLD THE DATE

Sunday, October 26, 2003

We wish to pay tribute and express our deepest gratitude to some of our most recent benefactors for their generosity and support.

Esther Zipper and family made a generous donation to the Department of Oncology in memory of their loving husband, father and grandfather, Alex Zipper.

Norman Zavalkoff and family honour the memory of Mona Zavalkoff with the creation of an annual grant for pulmonary oncology.

Sammy Rapps and family honour the memory of Phyllis Rapps, loving wife, mother and grandmother, with a generous donation to the Division of Colorectal Surgery.

Rose Sonabend dedicated five mobile blood pressure machines in memory of her beloved husband, Simon Sonabend.

NEWS FROM THE AUXILIARY

Membership is an important source of funding, enabling the Auxiliary to provide quality services and help the hospital purchase much needed equipment. Membership is open to men and women, and all are encouraged to join. For more information, please call (514) 340-8216 or e-mail: &co-pres@aux.jgh.mcgill.ca

New Presidents

The Auxiliary is proud to announce that Hela Boro (right) and Eileen Fleischer (left) were installed as Co-Presidents for the 2003-2005 term. They welcomed their new executive and board members at the 67th Annual Luncheon, held on May 8th in the hospital's Pavilion 'A' Auditorium.

Bridge Luncheon

The 23rd Annual Bridge Luncheon, held on April 30th at the Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem Synagogue, was enjoyable for the more than 300 serious bridge players who participated. Proceeds of the event, chaired by Phyllis Karper and Dorothy Rotholz, were used to purchase much needed equipment for the hospital's Maternal Child Health Unit.

Casino Royale

The mood was festive and the atmosphere electric at the Casino Royale fundraiser, held on April 10th at the Shaare Zion Synagogue. Master of Ceremonies Andy Nulman greeted over 400 guests who enjoyed sumptuous food and dynamic entertainment. Eddie Rogo, from Empire Auctions, auctioned off a variety of exciting gifts such as a helicopter excursion, a flight aboard a private jet to New York, golf packages and sports memorabilia.

Over $125,000 was raised for the Department of Pathology, a department that provides vital diagnostic expertise to virtually all branches of medicine and surgery. Dr. Marie-Laure Brisson, chief of the Department, was on hand to address the crowd and thank them for their support.

Hats off to Co-Chairmen Eileen Fleischer, Harriet Krakower and Paul Azeff for their hard work and organizational savvy. Special thanks to major sponsor CIBC Wood Gundy.

entrepreneurial activities will be a key component in securing the future of the JGH.

- It was also our commitment to bring strong leadership and management to the Foundation. Myer Bick, our Foundation President for the past two years, is a CEO with the capability to open doors and merit the respect of donors, the community at large and the hospital community. His vision, commitment, "menchlechkeit" and leadership of a talented team will enable us to expand our activities and ensure a future of unlimited possibility for the JGH.
- The launching of the most ambitious campaign in the history of the JGH to pay for the priorities of the hospital was of paramount importance. The goal was not arbitrary. It is a totally realistic objective based on the needs established in the strategic plan. Initially, there was some resistance regarding the viability of this goal; however, our leaders, campaigners, supporters and donors have come to embrace our objective with unparalleled energy and enthusiasm.

Under the capable leadership of our seasoned co-chairs, Morty Brownstein and Eddie Wiltzer, assisted by our President, Myer Bick, and Foundation Chair, Jimmy Alexander, there is no question that we will succeed. They have broadened our base of campaigners, attracted new, enthusiastic and talented individuals and have the resources and full support of the entire hospital community—all the necessary ingredients to mount a successful campaign and ensure the future protection and success of one of the prize jewels of our community.

- We have actively worked for eight years on the acquisition of the Soeurs de Ste Croix Property from Côte Ste. Catherine to Legaré, just north of the hospital. As this step is generally believed to be as important and strategic to the future of the JGH as the original purchase of our land on Côte Ste. Catherine was by our founders, we are thrilled to report that the documentation is virtually complete, and we will take title and possession of the property in January 2005.
- Recruitment of young leadership to take ownership and responsibility for the future of the hospital was one of our main objectives, and we are all incredibly pleased with the extensive addition of young people to our ranks at all levels. Thanks to the very considerable efforts of Jimmy Alexander and other members of the Board and President's Advisory Committee, we have laid the foundation for a future solid succession of lay leadership.
- Another of our objectives was to see a more equitable handling of some of the matters pertaining to the JGH and McGill University. We made some major inroads with the appointment of Dr. Gerald Batist as Chairman of the Department of Oncology at McGill. We also were able to persuade McGill to refocus its allocation to the JGH to be far more reflective of our teaching mission. The channels of communication have been strengthened, and we look forward to many years of collaboration between our two institutions.
- It was also the intention of our administration to support and advance Continuous Quality Improvement and Humanization of Care within the hospital. The members of these committees deserve praise for their extraordinary job in continuously driving our hospital to go further ... keeping us at the forefront as an institution that truly demonstrates that we care. I recently had the opportunity to witness our excellence of care as a patient. The incredible quality delivery to all patients from emergency to the recovery room to the floor was evident throughout and to all patients. The passion and commitment of our caregivers was heartwarming.
- Our searches were successfully concluded for Chief of the Department of Obstetrics and Gynecology with the appointment of Dr. Togas Tulandi, and Chief of the Department of Surgery with the reappointment of Dr. Martin Black. We wish our chiefs well as they continue to build their specialties and recruitment at the JGH. As a result of strong teamwork at all levels, we also succeeded in completing some very challenging recruiting of critical medical specialists.
- Reducing nursing vacancies was also a major objective of our administration. With the implementation of a number of strategies set forth by Associate Executive Director (Nursing) Mona Kravitz and her team, along with a group of very dedicated nurses, last year's average vacancy rate was 7.4% and this year it is 5.2%. We have gone from 150 vacancies in June 2000 to 25.8 this year, which is extraordinary given the critical world-wide shortage of nurses. Kudos and appreciation also go to the administration for instituting and maintaining a policy of treating nurses as respected partners in the process of patient care.
- Our doctors perform miraculous acts on a daily basis under challenging conditions. Although we don't always take the time to express our thanks, we are sincerely grateful for their efforts. During my term, we were determined to establish an event to formally show our appreciation to our doctors for the exemplary work they do at the JGH, and we're delighted that the first such event will take place on September 21st this year.

In conclusion, given the need for our healthcare professionals to have adequate space to work and to fulfill our strategic objectives, it was essential to complete a master plan, commissioned and reviewed by the administration with all of the diverse interest groups in the hospital. It was also imperative to enlist the approval of the Régie régionale and government. The master plan is active and quickly evolving, as we go back to the drawing boards to include the acquisition of the property adjacent to the hospital. I am pleased to report that during the latter part of my term and just prior to the election, the government had approved $20 million which, when combined with the $7.6 million of CFI grants and approximately $22 million of Foundation funds, will enable us to proceed immediately with the expansion of the "E" wing, (the Cummings Pavilion). Further negotiations with the government will be needed in the very near future to obtain the additional funds required for our research mission and the much-needed "H" wing.

I step down from my position as President at the end of May, knowing that I will follow in the footsteps of so many of our dedicated past Presidents who have remained involved and passionate about our mission and our future. I step down with a smile knowing so much has been accomplished, and certain there is a powerful team in place, ready to overcome any potential obstacles to fulfilling our strategic objectives and long-term goals. I also leave knowing that the leadership of the hospital is in good hands as Stanley Plotnick takes his place at the helm of the JGH as President. I wish him well, knowing that he is a first class community leader with a long and successful record of achievements and a sincere devotion to maintaining the integrity of the JGH.

I am also confident that with Henri Elbaz as his CEO, he can't go wrong. Henri's vision, experience, firm-handed leadership, guidance, friendship and relentless diligence of execution—always in the most beneficial way for the hospital—make him the ideal partner in navigating and steering this wonderful and complex institution.

On behalf of myself and our community, I thank you one and all for your collaboration, friendship and support.

One of these difficult issues is conjugal violence, which often is expressed physically during pregnancy. Part of Ms. Cobrin's job is to teach nurses how to pick up signs of conjugal violence what types of questions to ask, what language to use and how to react appropriately and sensitively in these situations. Ms. Cobrin is particularly excited about being part of a newly created workgroup on conjugal violence, whose long-term goal is the development of a violence screening and assessment tool for nurses.

Other major issues that can have a tremendous impact on adjustment to parenthood include substance abuse, depression or other psychiatric illnesses, and teenage pregnancy. In addition to the usual stresses of parenthood, newly arrived immigrants and refugees must deal with adaptation to a completely new culture and language.

Parenthood can also be traumatic when things go wrong. The unexpected death of an infant, a baby born with birth abnormalities or potential chronic problems, very ill, premature babies whose prognosis is uncertain—these situations can be very difficult for new parents to deal with. "Parents whose babies are in the NICU often feel anxious and helpless," notes Sherrie Poplack, social work supervisor. "Parenting an ill baby is stressful."

Social workers are assigned to virtually every service throughout the hospital. To respond to occasional requests from those few areas (such as One Day Surgery) that do not have an assigned social worker, the Department of Social Service operates an intake system upon referral. There are 27 part-time and full-time social workers and social counsellors in the department.

Clinical nutrition

Patients undergoing radiation therapy typically come to the hospital every single day, five days a week for a period of one to seven weeks. It is the job of the clinical nutritionist to meet with patients on a weekly basis to ensure that their nutritional requirements are being met and that they are not losing weight. As Clinical Nutritionist Heather Nathens explains, the calorie and protein requirements of these patients are higher than normal because of the stress that radiotherapy treatments place on the body. Paradoxically, fatigue—one of the side-effects of treatment—may interfere with patients' ability to prepare meals for themselves.

Nineteen professional dietitians work in the Department of Dietetics. Clinical nutritionists are assigned to every in-patient unit as well as all out-patient clinics.

Generally, Ms. Nathens works with patients undergoing treatment for prostate, colorectal, lung and endometrial (the lining of the womb) cancers. She meets new patients at the beginning of their treatments, weighs them, recommends specific diets and offers menu suggestions and/or dietary supplements when appropriate. Prostate and colorectal cancer patients, for example, may experience diarrhea and a low-fibre, low residue diet is taught. Lung cancer patients who have difficulty swallowing are given advice on modifying the texture of foods and provided with high calorie, high protein supplements when necessary.

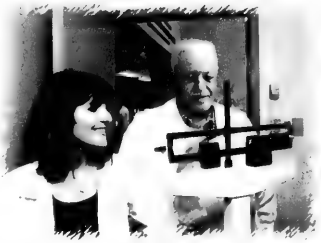
Since dehydration is a serious risk, patients are encouraged to drink lots of fluids. If a patient has lost a significant amount of weight, the clinical nutritionist will immediately speak to the nurse to have her check for signs of dehydration.

The Division of Radiation Oncology consists of a tight knit group of professionals – from radiation oncologists to nurses, technologists, dietitians, clerical staff, orderlies and Hope & Cope volunteers and staff – who respect each other's expertise. "This is an extremely rewarding place to work. The staff is very caring, committed and approachable, and the patients are so appreciative of everything we do for them," concludes Ms. Nathens.



Clinical nutritionist Heather Nathens weighs patient Leo Laberge.

Physiotherapy

The Department of Physiotherapy consists of approximately 20 physiotherapists. The department maintains an active presence on most units throughout the hospital including orthopedics, medicine, geriatrics and all surgical services. Physiotherapists are also on call to the Emergency Department, the Maternal-Child Health Unit, the Neonatal Intensive Care Unit and Psychiatry. Physiotherapy is also offered on an outpatient basis upon referral.

"We view patients as partners in managing their care," states Lynn Gillespie, physiotherapy inpatient coordinator. Keira Cape and Audrey Abikhzer, the physiotherapists currently on the cardiac surgery service, play an important role in helping patients recover from this complicated surgery that affects not just the cardiovascular system but also the musculo-skeletal and respiratory systems.

The goals of physiotherapy include preventing respiratory complications, assisting patients in regaining their mobility, evaluating their readiness for discharge and educating them about what to expect during and after surgery as well as which activities they can perform once they are at home.

As much as possible, continuity of care is maintained, meaning that the same physiotherapist sees the patient pre-operatively, and post-operatively in the Intensive Care Unit and on the Cardiac Surgery Unit. This allows the therapist to develop a rapport with patients, evaluating their needs, their level of anxiety, their ability to process information and their progress following surgery.

During the pre-operative education session, the therapist evaluates the patient's respiratory status and functional level, lifestyle factors and any other health issues that may affect their recovery. "We show patients exactly what to do after surgery—how to cough, how to move and how to exercise to maintain strength in their legs," explain the therapists. "This is reassuring for patients, who take comfort in the knowledge of what to expect. It's also important in terms of preventing post-surgical complications."

In the immediate post-operative period, physiotherapists, in conjunction with the rest of the team, assist with breathing exercises and respiratory care. Despite the complexity of the surgery, most patients are encouraged to become mobile as early as the day after surgery. In most cases, they are walking by day two and may be home as early as day four or five.

Physiotherapists provide detailed teaching prior to discharge. Instructions are often given in the presence of a family member. Written material, including diagrams, is provided and patients are encouraged to call their physiotherapist should they have any additional questions during their recovery at home.

"There is a great deal of satisfaction in seeing patients do well and in knowing that we play an important role in their recovery," say the physiotherapists. Another source of satisfaction is the supportive environment nurtured by the physicians and nurses on the Cardiac Surgery Service, who view physiotherapists as key members of the treatment team.

Message de Jonathan Wener

En tant que président sortant, j'ai le devoir et l'honneur de faire le bilan des réalisations de l'HGJ durant les trois dernières années. Avant de commencer, je dois souligner l'immense privilège qui m'a été accordé de travailler avec un groupe de personnes d'un professionnalisme et d'un dévouement étonnants, des personnes qui se sont consacrées avec passion aux soins et au bien-être de la population. Chacun de nos succès, nous le devons à notre personnel déterminé, talentueux et très dynamique qui, sans relâche, a travaillé en équipe pour surmonter les obstacles et résoudre les problèmes, sans jamais perdre de vue nos objectifs.

Réalisations :

- J'ai assumé la responsabilité de présider le nouveau plan stratégique quinquennal de l'Hôpital, définissant nos objectifs et nos aspirations. Ce processus important, global et d'une grande minutie visait à rassembler les points de vue de tous les groupes d'intérêts de l'Hôpital afin de créer un plan global, approuvé par tous. Cette démarche a suscité un enthousiasme sans précédent et une grande collaboration de la part des médecins, du personnel infirmier, de la direction et des professionnels de la santé. Tous ont contribué à définir les priorités, nous aidant à rencontrer les nombreux objectifs du plan. Jusqu'à présent, l'approbation du programme du Centre intégré du cancer par toutes les disciplines constitue l'une de nos réalisations les plus importantes, dont je tire une très grande satisfaction. Notre institution regroupe un nombre impressionnant de scientifiques en oncologie clinique, et nous visons la désignation de Centre intégré du cancer par le Québec.

- En raison de la conjoncture économique actuelle concernant la gestion de cette importante institution publique qu'est notre hôpital, l'un de nos premiers objectifs a été d'accroître notre apport en capital. Nous avons vite mis l'accent sur des secteurs susceptibles de provoquer assez rapidement une augmentation des revenus pour financer les nombreux programmes en vigueur. Nos revenus ont connu une augmentation qui est passée de 935 911 $ en 1999 à 1 752 000 $ vers la fin de 2002. Nous avons obtenu de tels résultats sous l'habile direction de Paul Lowenstein, assisté d'un comité très actif. Nous félicitons Paul et son équipe de leur dévouement et de leur empressement à étudier chaque secteur dans le but de maximiser les revenus et

L'Hôpital a le plaisir d'annoncer que M. Stanley K. Plotnick a été élu président du conseil d'administration pour un mandat de deux ans. Il occupera son poste à compter du mois de juin 2003.

Avant exercé les fonctions de vice-président de l'Hôpital et de membre du conseil d'administration de la Fondation, M. Plotnick est habitué aux défis, aux forces et aux réalisations de l'Hôpital général juif. Il se montre également très enthousiaste à l'idée d'avoir l'occasion de diriger notre institution durant une période qui laisse présager un développement et une croissance sans précédent.

Son engagement à l'égard du bien-être d'autrui a été souligné par l'attribution de nombreux prix, incluant le Distinguished Leadership Award de la Fédération CJA et le Outstanding Montrealers Award du State of Israel Bonds. En mai 2002, M. Plotnick était l'invité d'honneur du Jewish National Fund Negev Dinner.

M. Plotnick est président de AVS Technologies, une société vouée à la conception, au développement, à l'importation et à la distribution de produits électroniques à l'intention des consommateurs. M. Plotnick est diplômé de l'Université McGill et de la Sloan School of Management, Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

Nous jetons un éclairage sur le travail d'une poignée de professionnels paramédicaux. Ces personnes hautement qualifiées travaillent au sein d'une équipe multidisciplinaire et se consacrent à aider les patients à reprendre des forces ainsi qu'à recouvrer la santé et leur autonomie.

Hôpital d'enseignement de l'Université McGill

Les personnes qui font l'événement

Chef du Service d'oto-rhino-laryngologie de l'HGJ depuis 1992, le Dr Frenkiel est spécialisé en rhinologie et en chirurgie endoscopique des sinus. Sous sa direction, le Service a élargi son champ d'expertise à tous les aspects liés à l'oto-rhino-laryngologie, incluant la chirurgie cervico-faciale. Le Dr Frenkiel est également professeur à la faculté de médecine de l'Université McGill. Il se consacre à la pratique et à la promotion de la médecine universitaire et il a été élu Meilleur professeur par ses étudiants du département d'oto-rhino-laryngologie de McGill.

Le Dr Frenkiel est l'auteur de plus de 150 publications, dont des articles de journaux et des chapitres de livres revus par des pairs ainsi que des travaux multimédias. Conférencier et présentateur dans de nombreuses conférences nationales et internationales, il y a présenté les résultats de ses travaux dans des sous-spécialités comme la chirurgie des sinus, l'étude de l'écoulement de l'air dans les fosses nasales et la biologie moléculaire de la sinusite chronique.

Nous sommes heureux d'accueillir le Dr Walter Gotlieb qui travaille depuis peu au Service de gynéco-obstétrique. Professeur agrégé à l'Université McGill, le Dr Gotlieb a cette particularité : il est le premier gynéco-oncologue au service de l'Hôpital général juif. Il n'existe que 1 000 spécialistes en gynéco-oncologie dans le monde. Les cancers gynécologiques comprennent le cancer de la vulve, du vagin, de l'utérus, du col et des ovaires.

Diplômé en médecine dans sa Belgique natale, le Dr Gotlieb s'est spécialisé durant six ans aux États-Unis (National Institutes of Health et University of California, à Los Angeles). Il a été par la suite recruté par l'hôpital Tel Hashomer en Israël, où il a mis sur pied le service de gynéco-oncologie.

Organiser ce service à l'HGJ a représenté un véritable défi. Pour ce faire, il a fallu utiliser nos ressources en recherche appliquée qui avaient attiré le Dr Gotlieb dans notre institution. Le développement de nouveaux traitements fondés sur le génie génétique pour soigner notamment le cancer des ovaires demeure le principal intérêt du Dr Gotlieb en matière de recherche.

Il explique : « Mon objectif consiste à fournir des services spécialisés aux patientes atteintes de cancers gynécologiques et à leur donner accès à de nouvelles options thérapeutiques améliorées. »

Nous souhaitons également la bienvenue au Dr Martin Gyger à la Division d'hématologie. Professeur agrégé de médecine à l'Université McGill, le Dr Gyger est directeur de notre programme de transplantation de cellules souches et directeur de l'Unité d'aphérèse. Il se spécialise dans la transplantation de cellules souches hématopoïétiques, une intervention relativement simple et indolore qui ne nécessite ni chirurgie ni hospitalisation. Cette technique s'avère efficace chez 30 à 50 % des patients atteints de lymphome hodgkinien ou de lymphome non hodgkinien. La recherche du Dr Gyger est principalement axée sur la greffe de cellules souches non myéoablatives allogéniques. Cette intervention plus complexe et comportant un risque de rejet implique la transplantation de moelle osseuse prélevée chez un parent (généralement le frère ou la sœur). On réserve cette procédure aux patients dont les cellules souches sont trop contaminées.

Félicitations à Kotiel Berdugo qui vient d'être nommé directeur de la Division des services techniques. « Mes objectifs consistent à augmenter les normes de qualité des services de la Division, à améliorer les lieux consacrés aux unités de soins et à gérer efficacement les nombreux projets d'expansion de l'Hôpital », explique M. Berdugo.

En 1994, M. Berdugo entrait au service de l'HGJ en tant que chef du centre thermique, un poste qu'il a occupé

La campagne de financement illustre nos efforts conjugués et notre détermination à guider les nouveaux pas de l'Hôpital général juif en matière de services médicaux, de soins et de recherche. L'accent a été mis sur nos quatre « piliers » : le programme du Centre intégré du cancer, le Centre cardiovasculaire, l'expansion de l'Institut Lady Davis de recherches médicales et l'amélioration et le soutien des services.

Dirigée par Morton Brownstein et Edward Wiltzer, l'équipe de la campagne a clairement démontré la nécessité d'amasser des fonds substantiels pour assurer le développement de l'Hôpital, aujourd'hui et demain. Il nous faudra, entre autres, voir au recrutement et au maintien en place d'excellents professionnels, ajouter des locaux, rénover les anciens, acquérir de nouveaux équipements et accroître l'espace de nos installations de recherche devenues trop exiguës. Bien que les objectifs de la campagne soient ambitieux, ils reflètent avec justesse les besoins réels d'un établissement médical de premier plan, à l'ère du 21e siècle.

Le message est clair : la priorité de l'Hôpital général juif consiste à fournir aux patients d'excellents soins qui répondent aux normes les plus élevées. La générosité de nos donateurs nous permettra de réaliser cette mission.

Les soins multidisciplinaires

— la clé de la guérison

Durant une hospitalisation, on constate que le rétablissement à la suite d'une maladie grave ou d'une blessure requiert souvent la participation d'une équipe de professionnels de la santé regroupant divers spécialistes. Dans cette édition des Nouvelles HGJ, nous jetons un éclairage sur le travail d'une poignée de professionnels paramédicaux. Ces personnes hautement qualifiées travaillent au sein d'une équipe multidisciplinaire et se consacrent à aider les patients à reprendre des forces et ainsi qu'à recouvrer la santé et leur autonomie.

L'orthophonie

Le Service d'audiologie et d'orthophonie se compose d'une équipe formée de quatre orthophonistes et de quatre audiologistes.
Ils travaillent presque partout dans l'hôpital et assurent une présence marquée en médecine, neurologie, oncologie et dans le Service d'oto-rhino-laryngologie ainsi que dans le programme de chirurgie cervico-faciale.

Imaginez la frustration d'avoir en tête tous les mots, mais d'être incapable de les verbaliser pour exprimer ses besoins, ses pensées et ses idées. Ce problème est fréquent chez les personnes victimes d'accident vasculaire cérébral (AVC) et, par le fait même, il affecte leur famille.

Dès sa première rencontre avec les patients, M^me^ Hargraves effectue une évaluation minutieuse de la déglutition, du langage et de la parole du patient. Les troubles de la déglutition, qu'on appelle aussi dysphagie, sont des effets secondaires courants liés aux AVC. Il importe de les évaluer immédiatement, car ce problème peut mettre en danger la vie des patients. En effet, les malades qui ne peuvent adéquatement protéger leurs voies aériennes courent le risque de s'étouffer ou d'aspirer des aliments ou des liquides qui se logent dans les poumons. M^me^ Hargraves examine donc les fonctions pharyngiennes orales des patients en leur donnant des aliments et des liquides de consistance différente pour voir ce qu'ils peuvent tolérer. Durant leur hospitalisation, elle continue de surveiller leur progrès, augmentant la consistance des aliments lorsque leur faculté d'avaler s'améliore.

L'évaluation du langage et de la parole est également importante. « Habituellement, il y a chevauchement entre les troubles du langage et de la parole, explique M^me^ Hargraves. Mais un trouble peut exister sans l'autre. Tout dépend de l'étendue des dommages et de la région du cerveau affectée par l'AVC. » L'évaluation du langage consiste à examiner la faculté du patient à comprendre et à s'exprimer, ce qui inclut souvent une évaluation de sa capacité à lire et à écrire. L'évaluation de la parole est axée sur les difficultés d'articulation et de production vocale. Là encore, l'éducation du patient et de sa famille est très importante.

Une fois les évaluations terminées, M^me^ Hargraves travaille étroitement avec le patient et sa famille, leur enseignant des techniques visant à améliorer la communication. Les sessions se déroulent dans un environnement calme et sans bruit, libre de toute distraction. L'orthophoniste donnera des renseignements par bribes au patient pour qu'il puisse traiter l'information et l'absorber plus facilement. Le patient apprendra également à incorporer des méthodes non verbales de communication en utilisant des gestes, des aides visuelles et d'autres moyens tactiles.

L'ergothérapie

« En tant qu'ergothérapeute, mon objectif consiste à aider les patients à regagner la dextérité dont ils ont besoin pour être autonomes et mener une vie productive », explique Gabi Rosberger, spécialisée en ergothérapie pour la population gériatrique. Cette dextérité que nous prenons pour acquise comprend, par exemple, la marche, la capacité de se vêtir, de se baigner et de faire la cuisine.

Des études ont démontré qu'il fallait souvent plus de temps à un patient pour retrouver son autonomie fonctionnelle que pour se rétablir d'une maladie ayant nécessité une hospitalisation.

Le rapport entre l'autonomie et la santé n'est pas toujours évident pour les patients et leur famille, constate M^me^ Rosberger, et l'incapacité n'est pas inévitable en vieillissant. « Par conséquent, l'éducation des familles et du personnel est un élément essentiel du travail de l'ergothérapeute.

La consultation avec l'ergothérapeute commence par un examen de l'histoire du patient, de son dossier médical et par des entretiens avec le patient, sa famille et ses soignants. Les évaluations cognitives et fonctionnelles sont conçues pour identifier ce que le patient peut faire et connaître son niveau maximum d'autonomie fonctionnelle avant sa maladie. Les visites à domicile, faites si possible en présence des soignants ou des membres de la famille, donnent l'occasion à l'ergothérapeute d'évaluer les fonctions du patient et de repérer les obstacles nuisant à ses activités quotidiennes. « Parfois, il suffit de faire de petites modifications dans la maison pour aider les soignants à assurer la sécurité du patient », explique M^me^ Rosberger.

Les ergothérapeutes peuvent suggérer des aides fonctionnelles et les fabriquer pour rendre leurs patients plus autonomes. Certaines aides facilitent la position assise ou la posture des personnes âgées. C'est ainsi qu'on previent les escarres de décubitus et les problèmes de peau. Ces spécialistes recommandent également l'usage d'orthétiques, comme les gouttières, les écharpes ou d'autres aides, pour maximiser l'autonomie du patient concernant ses soins personnels.

La collaboration interdisciplinaire fait partie intégrale de la philosophie de la Division de gériatrie. « Nous sommes tous partenaires et nous dépendons de l'expertise des uns et des autres, poursuit M^me^ Rosberger. Nos plus grands alliés sont les membres de la famille. Nous devons les aider à créer un environnement confortable et sécuritaire, où le patient pourra fonctionner en étant le plus autonome possible. »

Six ergothérapeutes travaillent dans l'hôpital, le plus souvent dans la Division de gériatrie et le Service de psychiatrie. En plus d'offrir des services aux patients, le Service d'ergothérapie fournit des consultations ergonomiques aux employés pour les aider à minimiser le risque de blessures, sur présentation d'une demande de consultation.

En Amérique du Nord, on considère généralement la venue d'un enfant comme l'un des plus beaux moments de la vie, sans toutefois accepter que cette naissance peut être une importante cause de stress. Lorsque les problèmes surgissent, qu'un homme et une femme éprouvent des difficultés à s'ajuster à leur nouveau rôle de parents, que des situations psychosociales à risque élevé menacent la sécurité du bébé, la travailleuse sociale Deborah Cobrin intervient pour évaluer la situation, faciliter cette période de transition, faire des recommandations, développer des plans d'action et, si nécessaire, contacter le CLSC et/ou la Protection de la jeunesse.

« Ma priorité est le bien-être du nouveau-né, et j'essaie de me rendre disponible pour aider les parents à régler leurs problèmes, explique M^me^ Cobrin. Heureusement pour moi, l'équipe des soins infirmiers de l'Unité de santé maternelle et infantile et celle de l'Unité des soins intensifs en néonatologie

Le Dr Stéphane Richard, lauréat du 2002 Young Investigator Award

Recruté en 1995 par l'Institut Lady Davis de recherches médicales, le Dr Richard est directeur de projet du groupe d'oncologie moléculaire Terry Fox et du Centre Bloomfield de recherche sur le vieillissement. Il est, en outre, professeur agrégé à l'Université McGill. Sa recherche, avec sur deux domaines, le cancer et la sclérose en plaques, lui a permis de découvrir des protéines impliquées dans chacune de ces maladies.

Dans le domaine de la sclérose en plaques, le Dr Richard étudie un gène apparenté à la protéine Sam68 qui existe chez les souris quaking, ainsi appelées car elles ne possèdent pas assez de myéline. La myéline est la membrane protectrice du système nerveux central (cerveau et moelle épinière). La sclérose en plaques est une maladie auto-immune, se traduisant par un mauvais fonctionnement du système de défense de l'organisme qui attaque la myéline et, souvent, la détruit en plaques. Cette maladie est particulièrement fréquente sous les latitudes Nord, dans des pays situés loin de l'équateur, comme le Canada.

Dans sa recherche publiée dans le journal Neuron (2002), le Dr Richard a démontré que les protéines quaking sont directement impliquées dans le processus de myélinisation. Dans la prochaine étape actuellement à l'étude, il utilise la protéine quaking pour stimuler la myélinisation (un processus appelé remyélinisation). « Ces travaux pourraient permettre de développer une stratégie efficace pour traiter la sclérose en plaques et neutraliser ses effets débilitants », poursuit le Dr Richard.

Originaire de Montréal, le Dr Richard a obtenu son B.Sc. en biochimie et un Ph.D. de la division de médecine expérimentale de l'Université McGill. Il a terminé sa formation post-doctorale dans un programme unique, combinant des activités universitaires et industrielles chez Pfizer, dans le Connecticut, et à la Washington University de St. Louis, considérée comme la Harvard du Midwest. Durant ses recherches sur l'immunologie et le processus de signalisation, il a découvert la protéine Sam68. « Mon travail en milieu universitaire et dans l'industrie sont des expériences uniques qui m'ont clairement fait comprendre les besoins et les défis propres à ces deux milieux », souligne le Dr Richard.

L'automne dernier, le Dr Gerard Mohr, chef de la Division de neurochirurgie, a passé deux semaines en Chine, où il avait été invité en tant que conférencier au Beijing Neurosurgical Institute et en tant que professeur invité et conférencier à la First Guangzhou International Neuro-oncology Meeting.

À noter que l'invitation à cette rencontre était singulièrement liée à l'Hôpital général juif. En effet, l'événement avait été organisé par le professeur Chen Zhong Ping, qui avait été chercheur, de 1993 à 1999, à l'Institut Lady Davis de recherches médicales. Aujourd'hui, le professeur est directeur de neurochirurgie au Sun Yat-Sen Cancer Hospital, à Guangzhou.

Dans l'ensemble, le Dr Mohr a été fort impressionné par sa visite des installations thérapeutiques modernes et spacieuses, toutes équipées des technologies les plus récentes et pourvues d'un personnel de soutien et de neurochirurgiens extrêmement compétents et très bien informés. Citons le Beijing Neurosurgical Institute, un hôpital de 330 lits avec 18 salles d'opération, où 95 neurochirurgiens dispensent des soins dans 10 domaines neurochirurgicaux distincts, notamment la base du crâne, les accidents vasculaires cérébraux, la pédiatrie et la chirurgie spinale. Durant son voyage, le Dr Mohr a découvert que le système de santé chinois semblait subir des changements majeurs avec l'introduction d'un système de santé privé, venant s'ajouter au système public.

Depuis son ouverture en décembre 2002, la nouvelle salle de ressources éducatives en chirurgie, dédiée au Dr Harvey Sigman, a obtenu un très gros succès auprès des résidents en chirurgie, des étudiants en médecine et des chirurgiens.

Dotée des plus récents équipements multimédia et de présentation ainsi que de ressources éducatives, comme des vidéos décrivant les techniques chirurgicales actuelles, des ordinateurs consacrés aux recherches en ligne (branchés à la bibliothèque des sciences de la santé), cette salle de ressources favorise l'autodidaxie et la préparation de présentation de cas. On y donne également des conférences médicales.

À l'occasion de l'inauguration de la salle, le Dr Harvey Sigman, chef de la Division de chirurgie générale, a été honoré pour son engagement de longue date envers l'éducation médicale et chirurgicale. Parlant du Dr Sigman, le Dr Bernard Shapiro, ex-recteur et vice-chancelier de l'Université McGill soulignait : « Il nous montre à tous ce que signifie être intelligent, bien informé, modeste et compréhensif... Nous, ses collègues, avons de la chance de l'avoir comme un modèle d'intégrité discret et suprêmement compétent. »

Le Dr Martin Black, chef du Service de chirurgie, était également présent à l'inauguration. Il a annoncé la nomination de la Dre Anna Derossis au poste de directrice de l'Éducation chirurgicale ainsi que la formation d'un comité chargé d'examiner les questions relatives à l'éducation en chirurgie. Depuis son arrivée à l'HGJ en octobre 2001, la Dre Derossis a eu comme priorité la création de cette salle de ressources éducatives. Professeure adjointe de chirurgie et d'oncologie à l'Université McGill, la Dre Derossis a obtenu sa maîtrise en éducation médicale avant de terminer une formation spécialisée en chirurgie du sein.

Dans le but de protéger les enfants contre la douleur, on met souvent ces derniers à l'écart des discussions sur la mort, soulignent la psychologue Dr Judy Gradinger et l'infirmière chef en pedopsychiatrie Rosemary Short, lors d'une conférence des soins infirmiers, intitulée Discussing Death with Children. Les deux spécialistes ont insisté sur le fait que les enfants ont besoin qu'on leur parle de la mort dans des termes clairs, honnêtes, directs et appropriés pour leur âge.

Les enfants de tout âge ont tendance à se montrer égocentriques, préoccupés par leurs propres besoins émotifs et en proie à l'insécurité. Il ont besoin d'obtenir l'assurance que l'on s'occupera d'eux; ils ont besoin d'être encouragés à exprimer leurs émotions et à pleurer la perte d'un être cher.

Toutefois, les parents aux prises avec leur propre douleur ou d'autres problèmes importants négligent trop souvent de faire participer les enfants à ce type de discussions. Après l'âge de cinq ans, un enfant devrait assister aux funérailles d'un proche en compagnie d'une personne moins touchée par le décès, capable d'en prendre soin. « Un enfant à qui l'on n'a pas donné l'occasion de faire ses adieux lors des funérailles ou au cimetière se sentira encore plus abandonné », explique la Dre Gradinger.

Les très jeunes enfants (de trois à six ans) prennent tout au pied de la lettre. Ils n'ont aucune notion du temps et croient la mort réversible. Donc, les euphémismes comme « Il est parti » ou « Il est allé au paradis » ne devraient pas être utilisés. L'enfant aura tendance à croire que la personne décédée est partie en voyage et qu'elle reviendra. Par ailleurs, on peut dire aux enfants qu'une personne qui est décédée ne peut plus penser, sentir, marcher ni parler.

Même si les enfants plus âgés (de six à neuf ans) commencent à comprendre que la mort est irrévocable, ils peuvent également craindre qu'elle soit contagieuse ou qu'un parent en bonne santé puisse mourir prochainement. Le chagrin et la colère provoquent par le sentiment d'avoir été abandonné, la culpabilité due à un moment de colère ou l'enfant souhaitait la mort du parent sont des émotions fréquentes chez des enfants de neuf à douze ans. Ces émotions peuvent affecter leur travail scolaire. « Il est très important pour les enfants de comprendre qu'ils ne sont pas responsables de la mort du parent », souligne la Dre Gradinger.

Les adolescents éprouvent également des sentiments de colère et de culpabilité, mais ils peuvent tenter de cacher leurs émotions. « Le fait qu'ils voient des amis et paraissent en forme ne signifie pas qu'ils ne souffrent pas, note la Dre Gradinger. Laissés à eux-mêmes avec leurs sentiments, les adolescents peuvent avoir des comportements à risque. »

Un tournoi de golf

Ouverture du Centre de prévention du cancer

Dirigé par le Dr Michael Pollak, oncologiste et chercheur en cancer, le CPC offre au public des renseignements récents et des ressources spécialisées, tout en se consacrant à l'avancement de la recherche dans le domaine de la prévention du cancer. Avec des experts affiliés dans les plus importantes disciplines médicales et chirurgicales, incluant le Dr Michael Dworkind, directeur adjoint, le CPC offre des conseils médicaux pratiques, des suggestions relatives au mode de vie, à l'alimentation et au dépistage en vue d'éduquer la population sur les moyens de réduire les dangers de développer certaines formes de cancer.

À l'aide des services médicaux et des services de counselling, le personnel du CPC informe les patients des risques génétiques de développer le cancer et les oriente vers des tests de dépistage appropriés. Le Centre offre également des programmes de nutrition et de désaccoutumance du tabac ainsi que des recommandations sur le mode de vie visant à réduire le risque de cancer.

Le Centre de prévention du cancer est situé au bureau C-107. Pour le joindre, composez le 340-8222, poste 4947.

Des recherches démontrent que dans les premières six semaines de post-partum, 40 % des mères qui allaitent éprouvent des problèmes d'allaitement. Le nouveau Programme d'allaitement Goldfarb du Centre de médecine familiale Herzl est une clinique novatrice qui offre aux futures mamans de l'information, des conseils et du soutien en matière d'allaitement.

Généreusement soutenu par un don de Robert et Lenore Goldfarb, le Programme est l'initiative personnelle de la Dre Perle Feldman. « Les médecins savent que l'allaitement est une bonne chose, rapporte la Dre Feldman, mais beaucoup n'ont pas appris comment gérer les problèmes d'allaitement ou comment les traiter. » Bien que d'autres programmes d'allaitement existent à Montréal, celui-ci est le seul à impliquer les médecins. L'un de ses principaux objectifs consiste à accroître le savoir et les compétences des résidents en médecine familiale, en pédiatrie et en obstétrique. En plus de la Dre Feldman, le programme réunit des consultantes en lactation, Carole Dobrich et Lenore Goldfarb, ainsi que trois boursiers de recherche en obstétrique.

Au cours du lancement du Programme, Lenore Goldfarb a parlé de sa propre expérience et de sa motivation à l'égard de ce programme. Bien que son enfant ait été mis au monde par une mère porteuse, Mme Goldfarb était bien déterminée à allaiter. Après avoir communiqué avec le Dr Jack Newman, pédiatre à Toronto et spécialiste en allaitement de renommée mondiale, elle a accepté de faire partie d'un protocole pour déclencher la lactation. Elle a allaité son fils avec succès durant huit mois, puis elle a collaboré à la création d'un guide intitulé The Protocols for Induced Lactation : A Guide for Maximising Breastmilk Production. Mme Goldfarb a également suivi des cours au Lactation Institute en Californie. Grâce à l'aide de la Dre Feldman et de Carole Dobrich, elle a terminé sa formation pratique et a reçu son diplôme de consultante en lactation.

Le Programme d'allaitement Goldfarb est ouvert sur rendez-vous les lundis, mercredis et jeudis, de 9 h à 12 h. Un groupe de soutien sur l'allaitement organise des rencontres informelles les mardis, de 13 h 30 à 15 h 30. Pour obtenir un rendez-vous, composez le 340-8253.

Le 30 avril, environ 60 jeunes gens d'affaires de la Chambre de commerce juive se sont réunis à l'Hôpital général juif – Sir Mortimer B. Davis pour un déjeuner d'affaires.

Selon Justin Vineberg, coprésident de la Chambre de commerce juive, cet organisme a pour objectif de fournir à ses membres des occasions de réseautage et d'établir des contacts à l'extérieur.

Le directeur général, Henri Elbaz, a parlé de la philosophie et des pratiques de gestion de l'Hôpital, axées sur les résultats. Il a expliqué que l'objectif de l'HGJ consistait à établir et à maintenir des normes élevées de qualité dans trois secteurs hospitaliers – les soins de santé, l'enseignement et la recherche – puis, à s'acquitter de la gestion de l'institution de façon responsable sur le plan fiscal. M. Elbaz poursuit : « Nous sommes l'un des hôpitaux les plus importants et les plus performants au Québec. Nous évaluons constamment les besoins des patients et nous examinons les questions relatives à la qualité lors de chaque réunion et durant tous les processus. »

Le Dr Marc Afilalo, chef du Service de l'urgence, a décrit comment l'Hôpital avait résolu la crise de l'encombrement, une crise qui persiste encore dans de nombreuses salles d'urgence, non seulement au Québec, mais partout dans le monde. Traitant une moyenne de 170 patients par jour, dont un grand nombre souffrent de problèmes médicaux complexes, le Service de l'urgence de l'HGJ est l'un des plus achalandés à Montréal.

durant cinq ans. De 1999 à 2002, il a été responsable des installations matérielles. Ses responsabilités comprenaient la supervision et la gestion de toutes les phases des projets de construction et de rénovation, de la conceptualisation initiale jusqu'à la fin des travaux (exemples : l'installation d'un accélérateur linéaire et l'expansion de la Division de neurologie). Il est particulièrement fier d'avoir initié trois projets de conservation de l'énergie, tous auto-financés. Ces projets, grâce auxquels l'Hôpital a économisé 7,5 millions de dollars, ont récemment remporté le Prix d'excellence en gestion de l'efficacité énergétique de l'Association des hôpitaux du Québec.

Après avoir terminé sa maîtrise en sciences appliquées (mathématiques) à l'Université Paul Sabatier de Toulouse, en France, M. Berdugo obtient son baccalauréat en génie mécanique de l'École polytechnique (Université de Montréal). Plus tard, il poursuit ses études pour décrocher un diplôme universitaire en gestion de l'École des Hautes Études commerciales de Montréal. Avant de travailler à l'HGJ, M. Berdugo était ingénieur chez Peerless Electric et ingénieur de projets chez Racan-Carrier Co.

Formation de scientifiques dans nos laboratoires

Les Drs George Chong et Elizabeth MacNamara contribuent chacun à la formation de la prochaine génération de scientifiques qui travaillent en laboratoire. Dans le cadre d'un programme financé par les IRSC, l'Institut de génétique/ Réseau canadien de maladies génétiques (RCMG), ces médecins ont accueilli Mme Audrey Dussereault, une étudiante du cégep à Lennoxville (Québec). Audrey est l'une des 16 étudiantes et étudiants à avoir été choisis parmi 330 candidats désireux de participer à ce programme national. Le Dr Will Foulkes, directeur du programme en génétique du cancer à l'HGJ et principal investigateur du RCMG, a noté que :

Le Dr Foulkes a également fait le nécessaire pour que Audrey puisse passer un certain temps dans le laboratoire de diagnostic moléculaire.

Comment gérer la ménopause?

Cet article porte sur la tenue de deux conférences qui ont eu lieu en mars 2003. Le Dr Wulf Utian, directeur général de la North American Menopause Society et la Dre Lauri Betito, psychologue, sexothérapeute et animatrice d'un talk-show radiophonique à CJAD, donnaient la première conférence publique intitulée Sex After Menopause and Hormone Replacement Therapy. Celle-ci avait été organisée conjointement par le Service de gynéco-obstétrique de l'HGJ et par la section québécoise de l'American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists. La seconde conférence, commanditée par la Rosalyn Lebovic Memorial Body & Soul Health Series des Auxiliaires, avait pour conférencière invitée la Dre Louise Miner, gynécologiste-obstétricienne et directrice de l'échographie obstétricale à l'HGJ.

La moyenne d'âge de la ménopause, définie par la cessation de la menstruation, est 51 ans. La périménopause couvre la période commençant de deux à huit ans avant la ménopause et la première année après la fin de la menstruation.

La périménopause se caractérise par une fluctuation du taux hormonal, l'irrégularité des cycles et la survenue de symptômes qui peuvent s'intensifier avec l'approche de la ménopause. Ces symptômes comprennent les bouffées de chaleur et des sueurs nocturnes, l'insomnie, une fragilité émotive, le vieillissement et la sécheresse de la peau, des problèmes de mémoire à court terme et une diminution du désir sexuel. Les femmes ne sont pas toutes affectées au même degré. En effet, bien que 85 % des femmes se plaignent de bouffées de chaleur, seulement 15 % d'entre elles en sont affectées au point d'avoir de grandes difficultés à dormir ou à effectuer leurs tâches quotidiennes.

On estime qu'on peut sans risque utiliser l'hormonothérapie de remplacement à court terme (quatre années ou moins) pour soulager certains symptômes de la ménopause, mais non la prescrire à titre préventif. L'hormonothérapie offre de nombreux avantages : protection contre l'ostéoporose, diminution des bouffées de chaleur, réduction des risques de cancer colorectal et de la maladie d'Alzheimer (bien que ce traitement ne ralentira pas la progression de la maladie d'Alzheimer si elle est déjà présente). La Dre Miner a spécifié que l'hormonothérapie était à déconseiller aux femmes présentant de forts antécédents familiaux de cancer du sein (mère, sœur, tante), des maladies graves du cœur, du foie ou des reins et de forts antecedents familiaux de caillots sanguins ou de thrombophilie. « En consultant leur gynécologue, suggère la Dre Miner, les femmes devraient reevaluer tous les ans leurs besoins en matière d'hormonothérapie ou chaque fois que de nouvelles données médicales deviennent disponibles. »

Premier directeur de la gestion privée globale chez RBC Investments, Domenico Diaco visait deux objectifs : réussir dans la catégorie Or (coureur des bois) du Marathon canadien de ski et recueillir des fonds pour le programme du Centre intégré du cancer.

Inébranlable malgré deux journées froides et exténuantes, Domenic a réussi dans la catégorie Or et recueilli près de 6 000 $ en commandites.

Toutes nos félicitations pour un tel succès!

La campagne de financement en ligne

Charitel est une société spécialisée dans les services téléphoniques interurbains. Affiliée à une entreprise téléphonique interurbaine Sprint, elle offre des tarifs très compétitifs (4,9 cents par minute, en tout temps et n'importe où au Canada et aux États-Unis). De plus, Charitel donne 5 % de tous ses revenus à des organismes de bienfaisance.

Le partenariat entre l'Hôpital général juif et Charitel permet à tous les abonnés de la société de donner 5 % de leur facture mensuelle (avant taxes) à la Fondation.

Le transfert de votre service téléphonique interurbain s'effectue virtuellement et n'a aucun impact sur votre ligne téléphonique ou sur votre système téléphonique et ses fonctions. Vous n'avez aucun numéro à signaler avant de faire votre appel.

Char tel

En choisissant l'entreprise de téléphonie interurbaine Charitel, vous paierez un taux inférieur à celui du marché et, en bout de ligne, vous aiderez la Fondation de l'Hôpital général juif.

La Société des gouverneurs – secteur de la recherche lançait, le 21 mai, sa série de conférences 2003 à l'intention de ses membres. Les Drs J. Enrique Silva, Andrew C. Karaplis et Alicia Schiffrin ont donné une conférence intitulée Endocrinology: Directions for a Better Life & Disease Prevention. Une visite guidée optionnelle des laboratoires des Drs Mark Trifiro et Andrew C. Karaplis précédait cette conférence. Vous pouvez devenir membre de la Société des gouverneurs – secteur de la recherche (don annuel de 250 $ et plus) en communiquant avec Cindy Hershon au 340-8222, poste 2235.

Mme Magda Freundlich a récemment avisé la Fondation qu'elle avait fait un legs dans son testament au profit de l'Hôpital. Pour que l'Hôpital puisse profiter de sa générosité dès aujourd'hui, elle a offert une plaque, qui sera installée dans la chapelle de l'HGJ, à la mémoire de son regretté mari, Emanuel. Originaires de Roumanie, Magda et son mari sont arrivés au Canada en 1954. Ils ont appris une nouvelle langue, travaillé très fort et construit leur vie dans leur pays d'adoption. Aider les autres a toujours fait partie de leurs valeurs. « C'est la chose à faire, affirme Magda, et d'ailleurs, ça fait plaisir. »

« Même si je ne suis pas riche, souligne Magda, je voulais m'assurer qu'une partie de nos économies, durement gagnées, iraient à une bonne cause. Je sais que l'Hôpital a besoin de cet argent et qu'il sera utilisé judicieusement. »

Une soirée à Athènes

Dirigé par Mme Sophia Demetelin, le Comité hellénique de l'HGJ s'engage à recueillir des fonds au profit de l'HGJ et de sa Division de médecine nucléaire. Le Comité a déjà entamé la planification d'un gala ou dîner-dansant qui se tiendra en soirée, le 19 octobre 2003. Bien connue de la communauté hellénique, Mme Demetelin a indiqué : « L'HGJ a fourni un soutien et des soins remarquables à la communauté hellénique. Il est donc tout naturel que cette même communauté lui manifeste son appui. »

N'oubliez pas cette date – le dimanche 26 octobre 2003.

Nous tenons à rendre hommage à plusieurs de nos plus récents donateurs et à leur exprimer notre profonde gratitude pour leur générosité et leur soutien :

NOUVELLES DES AUXILIAIRES

L'adhesion des membres est une source importante de financement qui permet aux Auxiliaires de fournir des services de qualite et d'aider l'Hôpital a acheter de l'equipement dont il a grand besoin. Nous invitons les hommes et les femmes a se joindre a nous. Pour plus de renseignements, téléphonez au (514) 340-8216 ou envoyez un courriel au &co-pres@aux.jgh.mcgill.ca

Nouvelles présidentes

Lunch de bridge

Offert le 30 avril à la synagogue Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem, le 23e Lunch de bridge a été fort apprécié des 300 fervents de bridge venus y participer. Les profits de l'événement, présidé par Phyllis Karper et Dorothy Rotholz, ont été consacrés à l'acquisition d'équipement d'une absolu nécessité pour le Centre de santé maternelle et infantile.

Casino Royale

Il y avait un air de fête et une atmosphère électrisante le 10 avril dernier, durant la collecte du Casino Royale, à la synagogue Shaare Zion. Le maître de cérémonie Andy Nulman a accueilli 400 invités, qui ont beaucoup apprécié les mets somptueux et le dynamisme de la soirée. Eddie Roggo, de Empire Auctions, a vendu aux enchères un excellent choix de cadeaux : excursion en hélicoptère, vol à destination de New York à bord d'un jet privé, sacs de golf et plusieurs souvenirs liés au domaine du sport.

Plus de 125 000 $ ont été recueillis au profit du Service de pathologie, un service qui fournit des diagnostics d'une importance vitale dans presque tous les secteurs de la médecine et de la chirurgie. La Dre Marie-Laure Brisson, chef du Service, était présente pour s'adresser aux membres de l'assistance et les remercier de leur soutien.

- Nous nous étions également engagés à apporter une solide gestion et un leadership fort à la Fondation. Son président, Myer Bick, en poste depuis deux ans, est un chef habile à ouvrir des portes et à inspirer le respect aux donateurs, à l'ensemble de la communauté et au personnel de l'Hôpital. Sa vision, son engagement, son souci des convenances (menschechkeit) et sa gestion d'une équipe talentueuse nous permettront de multiplier nos activités et d'assurer, pour l'HGJ, un avenir dont les possibilités seront illimitées.
- Le lancement de la campagne de financement, la plus ambitieuse de l'histoire de l'HGJ, ayant pour but le financement de ses priorités, s'est avéré d'une importance capitale. Son objectif n'était pas arbitraire. Bien au contraire, il est tout à fait réaliste, fondé sur les besoins énoncés dans le plan stratégique. Au départ, nous avons rencontré certaines résistances concernant la viabilité du projet. Toutefois, nos leaders, représentants, partisans et nos donateurs y ont finalement adhéré avec une énergie et un enthousiasme sans précédent.

Sous la compétente direction de nos coprésidents chevronnés, Morty Brownstein et Eddie Wiltzer, assistés de notre président Myer Bick et du président de la Fondation Jimmy Alexander, il ne fait aucun doute que nous atteindrons nos objectifs. Ces derniers ont élargi le nombre de représentants et attiré de nouvelles personnes enthousiastes et talentueuses. En outre, ils disposent des ressources et du plein appui de tous les membres de l'Hôpital. Tous ces ingrédients se révèlent indispensables pour organiser avec succès une campagne de financement et assurer la protection et la réussite de l'un des remarquables joyaux de notre communauté.

- Durant huit ans, nous avons activement travaillé à l'acquisition du domaine des Sœurs Sainte-Croix, du chemin de la Côte-Sainte-Catherine jusqu'à Légaré, domaine situé au nord de l'Hôpital. De façon générale, cette démarche est perçue comme une démarche tout aussi stratégique et importante pour l'avenir de l'HGJ que ne l'avait été l'acquisition initiale de notre propriété sur Côte-Sainte-Catherine pour nos fondateurs. Nous sommes heureux d'annoncer que la documentation est virtuellement terminée, et que nous serons détenteurs des titres de propriété, dont nous prendrons possession en janvier 2005.
- Le recrutement de jeunes dirigeants responsables de l'avenir de l'Hôpital constituait l'un de nos principaux objectifs. Or, nous sommes extrêmement heureux du nombre important de jeunes gens venus grossir nos rangs, à tous les niveaux. Grâce aux efforts considérables de Jimmy Alexander et d'autres membres du conseil d'administration et du comité consultatif du président, nous avons jeté les bases d'une future succession vigoureuse, formée de leaders dans la communauté.
- Un autre de nos objectifs consistait à rendre plus équitable la gestion de certaines questions relatives à l'HGJ et à l'Université McGill. Nous avons fait une percée importante avec la nomination du Dr Gerald Batist comme président du département d'oncologie de McGill. Nous avons également persuadé les dirigeants de cette université de revoir leur allocation à l'HGJ de sorte qu'elle reflète plus adéquatement notre mission en matière d'enseignement. Nous avons consolidé les voies de communication entre nos deux établissements et nous entrevoyons avec confiance de nombreuses années de collaboration.
- Notre direction a également voulu favoriser les processus d'amélioration continue de la qualité et de l'humanisation des soins. Les membres de ces comités méritent des éloges pour leur extraordinaire travail, qui a permis à l'Hôpital de sans cesse se perfectionner et de se maintenir à l'avant-garde de la prestation des soins attentifs. J'ai récemment eu l'occasion de constater l'excellence des soins en tant que patient. L'incroyable qualité dispensée à tous les patients, de l'urgence à la salle de récupération, est manifeste dans tout l'établissement. La passion et l'engagement de nos soignants sont réconfortantes.
- Nos recherches pour remplir certains postes ont donné d'excellents résultats : le Dr Togas Tulandi a été nommé chef du Service de gynéco-obstétrique, et le Dr Martin Black, chef du Service de chirurgie. Nous souhaitons à nos deux dirigeants de continuer de renforcer leur spécialité et de favoriser le recrutement. Grâce à un important travail d'équipe à tous les niveaux, nous sommes parvenus également à conclure, non sans difficulté, l'embauche de spécialistes médicaux d'une importance cruciale.
- Réduire le nombre de postes vacants en soins infirmiers a constitué un autre objectif majeur de la direction. Avec la mise en œuvre de plusieurs stratégies élaborées par Mona Kravitz, directrice générale adjointe (Soins infirmiers), et son équipe ainsi que par un groupe d'infirmières très dévouées, le pourcentage moyen des postes vacants, l'année dernière, s'élevait à 7,4 % et, cette année, à 5,2 %. Nous sommes passés de 150 postes vacants en juin 2000 à 25,8 cette année. Un résultat extraordinaire compte tenu de la pénurie mondiale d'infirmières et d'infirmiers. Félicitations et nos vifs remerciements aux membres de la direction qui ont instauré une politique où les infirmières sont traitées comme des partenaires estimées.
- Chaque jour, nos médecins pratiquent des actes prodigieux dans des conditions difficiles. Bien que nous ne prenons pas toujours le temps de les remercier, nous leurs sommes sincèrement reconnaissants. Durant mon mandat, nous avions la ferme intention de créer un événement qui témoignerait officiellement de notre gratitude à l'égard de nos médecins pour leur travail exemplaire à l'HGJ. Nous sommes ravis d'annoncer que ce premier événement aura lieu le 21 septembre prochain.

En conclusion, pour permettre l'expansion de nos locaux, une condition essentielle pour que nos professionnels de la santé disposent d'un espace de travail suffisant et pour l'atteinte de nos objectifs stratégiques, nous avons dû terminer un plan directeur commandé et revu par la direction avec tous les divers groupes d'intérêts de l'Hôpital. Il a aussi fallu obtenir l'autorisation de la Régie régionale et du gouvernement. Le plan directeur évolue rapidement, mais nous devons retourner à la case départ pour inclure l'acquisition de la propriété adjacente à la nôtre. J'ai le plaisir d'annoncer qu'à la fin de mon mandat, juste avant les élections, le gouvernement a autorisé un versement de 20 millions de dollars. En y ajoutant 7,6 millions de dollars de subventions de la FCI et 22 millions environ de la Fondation, nous serons en mesure de procéder immédiatement à l'expansion de l'aile E (le pavillon Cummings). Dans un prochain avenir, des négociations avec le gouvernement seront nécessaires pour obtenir les fonds additionnels nécessaires pour remplir notre mission de recherche et construire l'indispensable aile H.

À la fin du mois de mai, je quitterai mon poste de président, sachant que j'emboîterai le pas à un grand nombre de nos ex-présidents dévoués qui demeurent impliqués avec tant de passion dans la mission et dans l'avenir de l'Hôpital. Je me retire le sourire aux lèvres, sachant que tant de choses ont été accomplies et qu'une solide équipe est prête à surmonter tout obstacle éventuel pour atteindre nos objectifs stratégiques et réaliser nos projets à long terme. Je quitte en sachant également que la direction de l'Hôpital sera entre bonnes mains avec Stanley Plotnick qui prendra la barre de l'HGJ en tant que président. Je lui offre mes meilleurs vœux. Ce leader de premier plan dans la communauté a connu de magnifiques réussites et il a la ferme intention de maintenir l'intégrité de l'HGJ.

Je suis également convaincu qu'avec Henri Elbaz comme directeur général, il ne peut pas se tromper. La vision d'Henri, son expérience, son ferme leadership, ses bons conseils, son amitié et sa diligence acharnée – toujours bénéfique pour l'Hôpital – font de lui le partenaire idéal à la barre de cette merveilleuse et complexe institution.

En mon nom personnel et au nom de notre communauté, je vous remercie tous de votre collaboration, de votre amitié et de votre soutien.

Travail social

La violence conjugale qui s'exprime souvent physiquement durant la grossesse s'avère une question particulièrement difficile. L'une des tâches de Mme Cobrin consiste à enseigner aux infirmières comment repérer les signes de violence conjugale, quelles questions poser, quel langage utiliser et comment réagir adéquatement et avec sensibilité en présence d'une telle situation. Mme Cobrin est particulièrement heureuse de faire partie d'un nouveau groupe traitant de la violence conjugale, dont l'objectif à long terme est la création d'un outil de dépistage et d'évaluation de la violence à l'intention des infirmières.

D'autres problèmes majeurs peuvent avoir un énorme impact sur la façon dont les nouveaux parents s'ajustent à leur rôle, comme l'usage de drogues, la dépression ou d'autres maladies psychiatriques ainsi que la grossesse à l'adolescence. En plus des stress habituels liés au rôle des parents, les nouveaux immigrants et les réfugiés doivent également tenter de s'adapter à une nouvelle culture et à une nouvelle langue.

Être parent peut aussi être traumatisant quand un problème surgit. La mort imprévue d'un nourrisson, la naissance d'un enfant avec des anomalies ou des problèmes potentiellement chroniques, la venue d'un enfant très malade, d'un bébé prématuré dont le pronostic est incertain, toutes ces situations peuvent se révéler très difficiles à gérer pour les nouveaux parents. « Ceux, dont l'enfant est à l'USIN sont souvent anxieux et désarmés, indique Sherrie Poplack, superviseure du travail social. Avoir un enfant malade est une grande source de stress. »

Les travailleurs sociaux sont affectés à presque tous les services de l'hôpital. Pour répondre aux demandes occasionnelles de quelques secteurs (comme la chirurgie d'un jour) qui sont sans travailleurs sociaux, le Département des services sociaux dirige un système d'admission sur présentation d'une demande de consultation. Le Département comprend 27 travailleurs sociaux et conseillers à plein temps et à temps partiel.

La nutrition clinique

De façon générale, les patients qui subissent une chimiothérapie viennent à l'hôpital tous les jours, cinq jours par semaine, pour une période variant de une à sept semaines. Le travail des nutritionnistes cliniques consiste à rencontrer les patients une fois par semaine pour s'assurer qu'ils s'alimentent adéquatement et qu'ils ne perdent pas de poids. Selon la nutritionniste clinique, Heather Nathens, les besoins en calories et en protéines de ces patients sont plus élevés que la moyenne à cause du stress infligé à l'organisme par la radiothérapie. Paradoxalement, la fatigue – l'un des effets secondaires du traitement – peut nuire à la capacité des patients de se préparer des repas.

Comme la déshydratation est un risque grave, on encourage les patients à boire beaucoup de liquide. Lorsqu'un patient perd beaucoup de poids, la nutritionniste clinique en parle immédiatement à l'infirmière pour qu'elle vérifie les signes de déshydratation.

La Division de radio-oncologie est formée d'un groupe harmonieux de professionnels – radio-oncologues, infirmières, technologistes, diététistes, personnel de bureau, préposés aux malades, bénévoles et employés de l'Espoir, c'est la vie. Tous travaillent en étroite collaboration et respectent l'expertise de chacun. « C'est extrêmement satisfaisant de travailler ici, souligne Mme Nathens. Le personnel est très attentionné, déterminé et disponible, et les patients apprécient tout ce que l'on fait pour eux.

Formé d'environ 20 physiothérapeutes, le Service de physiothérapie assure une présence active dans la plupart des unités de l'hôpital, incluant l'orthopédie, la médecine, la gériatrie et tous les services de chirurgie. Les physiothérapeutes sont également disponibles sur appel au Service de l'urgence, à l'Unité de santé maternelle et infantile, à l'Unité de soins intensifs de la néonatologie et au Service de psychiatrie. Les patients peuvent obtenir des services de physiothérapie en clinique externe sur présentation d'une demande de consultation.

Autant que possible, on maintient la continuité des soins, c'est-à-dire que la même physiothérapeute voit le patient avant et après l'opération, dans l'Unité des soins intensifs et dans l'Unité de chirurgie cardiaque. Cela permet à la thérapeute de développer une relation avec le patient, d'évaluer ses besoins, son niveau d'anxiété, sa capacité de traiter l'information et de suivre ses progrès après l'opération.

Durant la session d'information qui précède l'intervention chirurgicale, la thérapeute évalue l'état du système respiratoire du patient et son niveau fonctionnel, des facteurs liés à son mode de vie ainsi que les autres problèmes de santé qui pourraient affecter son rétablissement. « Nous montrons au patient ce qu'il doit faire après l'opération – comment tousser, bouger et comment faire les exercices prescrits, qui maintiennent la force dans les jambes, expliquent les thérapeutes. Cette rencontre sert à rassurer le patient qui se sent mieux, car il sait à quoi s'attendre. C'est aussi important pour prévenir les complications post-chirurgicales. »

Immédiatement après la chirurgie, les physiothérapeutes, en collaboration avec le reste de l'équipe, aident les patients à faire leurs exercices de respiration et dispensent des soins respiratoires. Malgré la complexité de la chirurgie, on encourage la plupart des patients à devenir mobiles dès le premier jour après la chirurgie. Dans la plupart des cas, les patients marchent le deuxième jour et retournent à la maison quatre ou cinq jours plus tard.

Avant le départ du patient de l'hôpital, les physiothérapeutes lui donnent des instructions détaillées. Ces instructions sont souvent transmises en présence d'un membre de sa famille. Le patient reçoit des informations écrites, incluant des diagrammes, et on l'encourage à communiquer avec la physiothérapeute s'il se pose des questions durant son rétablissement à la maison.

Israeli company developing SARS detection kit

By ODED HERMONI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — A device that diagnoses SARS (Severe Acute Respiratory Syndrome) in its early stages is being developed by Medex Screen, an Israeli company headquartered in Dimona.

The first clinical testing was recently done on SARS patients in Singapore's central hospital, and a medical team there has been trained to use the device.

Tal Hirshman, Medex Screen's vice-president for business development, said the Israeli company will join with Singapore Technology, the country's largest industrial conglomerate, in a joint development of the diagnostic tool. The device allows for the immediate identification of SARS and other diseases without the need for medical professionals.

Clinically tested in Singapore

Depending on the results of the clinical testing, mass production of the device could begin within a month.

The company is holding talks with the health ministries in China and Taiwan, to arrange a similar series of tests in other areas afflicted by SARS, Hirshman said.

The diagnostic tool, which was developed to identify disorders in internal organs and the immune system, measures six different spots in the palms and feet of the patient and feeds the information into a computer.

"When the SARS virus broke out, we realized the Medex Test could probably be of use," said company spokesperson Zohar Faigenbaum. "So we tested the device on flu patients

Clown's magic works 'miracles'

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

It might take a miracle to make Israeli children in hospital smile, given their poor health and the relentless cycle of violence that surrounds them.

"Miracle" is the term Jeffrey Strong, otherwise known as Bonkers the Clown, uses to describe his experiences entertaining Jewish, Arab and Druze children in Israeli hospitals and schools earlier this year.

"At a couple of places, they said these kids haven't smiled before," said Strong, who has been clowning since 1980.

"They were laughing and smiling... It was a miracle."

PM Pledges Troops

OTTAWA — Prime Minister Jean Chretién has pledged to station peacekeepers between Israel and the Palestinians if the U.S.-sponsored "road map" leads to peace. The plan calls for a crackdown on Palestinian militias, the dismantling of some settlements and a Palestinian state by 2005. Chretién made the pledge in Moscow last month.

Diabetes Breakthrough

TEL AVIV — Tel Aviv University scientists have found a new way to generate human insulin-producing cells. Using stem cells from human fetal liver modified to introduce a gene responsible for developing insulin-producing cells, they found the new cells produced about a third of the insulin made in the pancreas. The cells could be transplanted to juvenile diabetes patients within a few years, if their rejection by the body's immune system can be solved.

Security Firms Prosper

JERUSALEM — The income of Israeli security firms rose by an average of 15 per cent in 2002, with some increasing business by 20 to 30 per cent, Dun and Bradstreet reported last week. Israel's 16 largest security firms, which employ 49,000 people, earned $478 million (US) in 2002. The largest, Hashmira, earned $182 million and is Israel's largest employer with 15,000 workers, 1,000 more than in the previous year.

Barghouti Cites Sharon

JERUSALEM — Palestinian militia leader Marwan Barghouti says Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's recent statement that Israel should not keep 3.5 million Palestinians under occupation backs his claim that, as a political leader, Israel has no right to try him. Barghouti, who is charged with involvement in terror attacks that killed 35 Israelis, argued in court last week that if Israel's leader says there is an occupation, it's logical to expect resistance to it. The court gave Barghouti until mid-July to decide if he will mount a defence.

World

Cartoon Criticized

CHICAGO — Readers of the Chicago Tribune are complaining about an editorial cartoon they consider anti-Semitic. The drawing by syndicated cartoonist Dick Locher, which appeared May 30, depicts U.S. President George W. Bush laying down dollar bills in front of a heavyset man with a large nose and Star of David on his jacket. The man, who is meant to be Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, says, "On second thought, the pathway to peace is looking a bit brighter." Locher, who is syndicated through Tribune Media Services, said he was simply commenting on how the United States spends millions on Mideast peace. But Tribune ombudsman Don Wycliff agreed with complaints the cartoon reinforces anti-Semitic stereotypes.

Cemetery Vandalized

MOSCOW — Several gravestones were smashed in a Jewish cemetery in Astrakhan in southern Russia in early May, the Union of Councils for Jews in the Former Soviet Union said last week. According to members of the local Jewish community, attacks on the cemetery occur "no less than once a year," Komsomolets Kaspiya, a local newspaper reported. Nobody was arrested in connection with the incidents. Some members of the community believe the latest attack was motivated by anti-Semitism, but a local Jewish leader blamed either youth "with nothing better to do" or common criminals.

New Aid Group

KISHINEV, Moldova — A new group was formed last week to help elderly and needy Jews in Moldova, one of Europe's poorest nations. Jewish business leaders in Kishinev started the Jewish Congress of Moldova, the first indigenous charity for 30,000 Jews in the former Soviet republic, located between Romania and Ukraine.

Grocery Store Torched

PARIS — A Jewish grocery store near Paris was gutted in an arson attack May 28. Trash cans and mattresses were set alight and thrown into the Hyperzol market in Creteil, the largest Jewish community in the Paris area. Police said two youths have been arrested and are helping the investigation.

Man Charged

SYRACUSE, N.Y. — A second man was charged last week in the torching of a shul here in October 2000, but he does not face arson charges, police said. Ahed Shehadeh, 29, of Syracuse, was charged with felony burglary in the $800,000 fire at Temple Beth El. In March, police charged Raussi "Ramsi" Uthman with arson, burglary and criminal mischief as hate crimes. Police could not say if Shehadeh will face additional charges or why he wasn't charged with arson. Shehadeh's charge is not considered a hate crime.

Help For Holocaust Survivors in Canada

NEW YORK — The Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany is allocating $200,837 (US) in 2003 to benefit elderly, needy Jewish Holocaust survivors in Canada.

The money is from an International Commission on Holocaust-Era Insurance Claims (ICHEIC) fund formed through a 2002 agreement among German insurance companies, the German government and international Jewish groups.

In Canada, money will go to three agencies that provide social services to Jewish survivors: the Cummings Jewish Centre for Seniors in Montreal, Jewish Family & Child Service in Toronto and the Vancouver Holocaust Education Centre.

A total of $15 million will be disbursed in 31 countries in 2003. Survivors in Israel will get some $6 million and those in the United States will get $2.4 million. Much of the money will be used to provide homecare.

The grants are part of $132 million in humanitarian funds to be distributed annually over 10 years by the ICHEIC, which has been criticized for the slow pace of its work and for high overhead costs. The ICHEIC has asked the Claims Conference to implement the initial distribution of the funds.

The funds "represent a long-delayed measure of justice… from the insurance companies [that] will help alleviate the needs among many elderly survivors," said Gideon Taylor, executive vice-president of the Claims Conference.

Individuals can file claims with the ICHEIC for compensation for unpaid insurance policies until Sept. 30. For more information, see www.icheic.org.

SARS explored from a Jewish point of view

By LAUREN KRUGEL
CJN Intern

A group of doctors and rabbis pondered the ethical and religious implications of the SARS outbreak at a symposium last week at Beth Jacob V'Anshei Drildz Congregation.

'God doesn't give us anything we can't handle'

Dr. David Rose, the head of the infectious disease committee at Scarborough Grace Hospital, the epicentre of the first SARS outbreak, said that in the midst of a second outbreak of the illness, there has been little time for health-care workers to reflect on the meaning behind the crisis.

As well, SARS has changed the way physicians interact with patients, Dr. Michael Gordon, vice-president of medical services at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, told the gathering, which was hosted by Torah In Motion and the Toronto Area Study Institute of Jewish Medical Ethics.

When Baycrest received directives from the government on how to deal with the illness, Gordon said, the centre's response was "to virtually shut down. We became a fortress."

(Due to the latest outbreak, Baycrest has reinstated many of the restrictions it had relaxed after the first wave of SARS died down. However, instead of barring all visitors and privately paid caregivers from the hospital and home to keep the centre SARS-free, residents are now allowed one visitor at a time and visitors continue to be screened as they enter through one entrance on the west side of the main complex.)

Gordon said it was especially important for the centre to restrict access, as SARS has proven to be most fatal among the elderly.

But because many Baycrest residents rely on family members and privately paid companions for one-on-one care, restrictions on visitors put a strain on Baycrest staff, who had to work harder to care for and socialize with patients, he said.

Ultimately, the experience was "enriching," Gordon said, since he and fellow staff members had the chance to interact with patients in a way they wouldn't normally have.

After carefully evaluating the situation, Gordon said, he placed the interests of the Baycrest community above individual family members who were demanding the right to see loved ones.

From a religious perspective, "the sense of community responsibility is very high in Judaism," Gordon said. "The hardest part was to tell families they were not allowed in the hospital."

Looking at issues in light of Torah often poses more questions than it answers, Rabbi Glatt said.

There is, therefore, no clear-cut halachic answer as to whether health care workers are obligated to risk their lives to treat patients, he said.

When evaluating the risk in saving someone else's life, you must consider your own life to be just as valuable as another person's, he said.

Although the Gemarah states that people with the ability to save a life are bound to do so, in real-life scenarios, it's not always so straightforward, he said, adding health-care workers should only take "reasonable risks" when dealing with SARS patients.

As both a doctor and a rabbi, he said, he uses Torah for guidance while at the same time acknowledging scientific laws.

"Halachah doesn't change. The medical facts change," he said. "God did not create us to bypass natural laws."

Rose and fellow physician Hy Dwosh from York Central Hospital in Richmond Hill shared some of their experiences on the front lines of the SARS battle.

Rose said SARS heralds a "significant and dramatic paradigm shift" in the way hospitals deal with contagious diseases.

The stirrings of a soul

From the editor's desk

One of the defining moments in the life and career of Itzhak Perlman was his appearance on the Ed Sullivan show in 1958. He was 13 years old. The photo inset in this column captures quite eloquently the essence of that poignant moment and the essence of the young musician.

Prodigiously talented, the curly headed youngster is so bashful he casts his eyes downward toward the stage to avoid looking directly at the tenderly affectionate superstar Sullivan. But even in his humility, the boy is smiling broadly.

Along with his incomparable musical artistry that was even then budding so beautifully in the shy adolescent, that sweet, captivating smile would become a lifelong Perlman trademark.

Forty-five years later, Perlman is as curly-headed as ever, though the curls are greyer than they are black. That was plainly apparent as he entered the stage at the Roy Thomson Hall last month to play with the Toronto Symphony Orchestra and its music director designate Peter Oundjian.

So too was the broad, endearing smile.

Perlman's smile, of course, evoked reciprocal expressions in the audience, who, to a person, rose to their feet and loudly applauded the virtuoso even before he had bowed a single note or phrase on his instrument. It was a very emotional moment. The warm feelings for the violinist were palpable throughout the sold-out auditorium, including on the stage where Perlman's fellow musicians and Maestro Oundjian joined in the effusive applause and smiles.

After a few moments, with appropriate decorum restored, the orchestra first, then joined by their exceptional soloist, swept into the first bars of Mozart's Violin Concerto No. 3 in G Major, K.216, "Strassbourg."

The familiar melody of the first movement allegro is swiftly paced and playful. If one had tried, one could have heard many within the audience sigh in whispered delight as the precise, laser-sharp sounds leapt from the virtuoso's violin. He moved his head from side to side in time with the music and the eyes-closed expressions on his smiling face accentuated the rhythm and the beat like a silent chronometer. Watching Perlman perform is an integral part of the listening pleasure.

The second movement, the adagio, is romantic. The solo brought to my mind the image of a lilac, delicate and soft, almost fragrant with fine music.

The third movement, the rondo-allegro, returned to the faster pace of the first movement. It was now in dance-form, jaunty and bouncing in regular exchanges between the violin and the orchestra. And it ended with a quiet farewell from the winds and horns.

The applause for the musicians, but especially for Perlman, exceeded the boisterous reception he received upon entering the stage. The standing ovation lasted for nearly 10 minutes.

The audience clearly appreciated the virtuoso's work, but there was also an obvious sense of admiration for the man.

Perlman was born in Tel Aviv in 1945. He began playing the violin when he was three. When he was four, he was struck by polio. His legs were paralyzed by the disease.

Even writing those words somehow renders abstract and distant their true meaning. Imagine, if one can, the anguish, confusion, helplessness, anger and utter agony of a four-year-old suddenly losing the ability to stand or to walk or to run.

Without the use of his legs from age four, Perlman eventually found within himself the ability to see the world and his place in it in a completely different way. Perhaps as a result, this gave him the ability to reach deeper into the music and to pull from it more of the encrypted treasures that are hidden in its geometry and mathematics and beauty.

There is often a discernably in-sync resonance between Perlman – what we might otherwise mysteriously refer to as his soul – and the many hidden messages of the musical passageways. He seems able to elicit for us the gift of the music more than many other musicians can. The newly improved acoustics of the Roy Thomson Hall are a wonderful showcase for the magical streams of flowing sounds that Perlman draws from the composer's mind.

Watching and listening to Perlman perform is an inspiration. It is an activity that leads one to reflect not only on the possibilities and stirring sounds of the music but, equally, if not more importantly perhaps, on the possibilities of the human soul.

Tuition hikes prompt calls to withhold payments

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Sharp and unforeseen tuition increases at several Toronto Jewish day schools have sparked a grassroots revolution by angry parents, who are advocating a form of civil disobedience when it comes to paying fees.

The newly-formed Jewish School Parents Association (JSPA) is advising parents not to comply with the usual methods of paying tuition for the 2003-2004 academic year.

Tools at the disposal of day school parents, some of whom face a 12 per cent hike in their children's tuition next year, include asking for their payments back, applying for a subsidy or withholding the increase, advises a Q&A released by the association.

The JSPA seeks to freeze tuition costs next year and reduce them in subsequent years.

It says the current round of increases will hit already beleaguered parents hard and will mean more children will simply drop out of the system, weakening it and, in the long run, the community itself.

"As parents, we pay the bills and like everyone else, those who pay the bills call the shots," says the group in an unusually sharp tone.

About 50 parents representing several day schools attended the association's May 27 founding meeting at Shaarei Tefillah Congregation. One of their first acts was to set up a Web site: www.dayschoolparents.com.

"We are the parents. We pay the bills. We pay the overwhelming cost of tuition. And we have virtually no say in how schools are governed," said one of the founders, Wayne Levin, who will have three children at Associated Hebrew Day Schools this September.

Associated parents were shocked when they were told tuition will be rising next year from $7,950 per child to $8,950, a 12.5 per cent hike. The school initially provided no explanation for the increase.

At United Synagogue Day Schools (USDS), fees will jump 11 per cent, from $8,950 per child, to $9,950. That's on top of a five per cent increase a year ago. Tuition at Leo Baeck Day School will jump by nine percent, to $8,300 (not including a building surcharge of $633). And at Eitz Chaim Schools, fees will go up by six per cent, from $8,600 per student, to $9,100.

Levin, a longtime critic of funding and fees, says the mean tuition at day schools has increased above the rate of inflation in 10 of the last 12 years. He said schools have announced increases without warning and without input from parents.

He said schools have been "remarkably dismissive" of parents' concerns and that parents have also been frustrated over what he called the lack of transparency and accountability at the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education and the federation itself.

"There are major systemic problems that are causing this [increase] and they need to be addressed," Levin said.

He said many parents are either "suffering in silence," are considering pulling their children out of schools or have already done so.

Levin said the JSPA may one day merge with the Ontario Association of Jewish Day Schools, a community-wide group representing all schools set up mainly to lobby for government funding. While withholding tuition doesn't solve anything, neither does paying the proposed increase, the group says in a mailing.

"By not complying with tuition demands, you will be expressing your dissatisfaction with the current situation."

For parents who have already mailed in tuition, "contact your school and ask for it back," the group advises. "Remind them that you can and will contact your bank to suspend all payment if necessary."

The group says it's "doubtful" schools would threaten a large number of families by not registering children "since there is strength in numbers."

Other tactics JSPA says are open to parents include:

- Apply for a subsidy.
- Pay last year's tuition, but provide the difference separately as a charitable contribution.
- Pay nothing, but enrol children anyway. "Let the school know that when they roll back the tuition to last year's level, you will provide your cheque."
- Pay $7,000 – the cut-off needed to qualify for Ontario's Equity in Education Tax Credit.

But, the group says, "the most common approach being taken, so far as we can tell, is to pay according to the 2002-2003 tuition schedule." Its Web site even has sample protest letters parents can download.

When parent Cari Cozierok Bahar opened her tuition notice from USDS, "I started crying. I said to my husband, 'That's it for us.'"

The couple has four children in the system. "You have to be wealthy to afford a Jewish education," Bahar said. "And it will continue to be unattainable unless something is done for working young Jews willing to make the sacrifice. Unfortunately, many young parents are not only in debt, they're losing sleep."

She and other parents decry that the decision to boost fees was made behind closed doors.

JSPA seeks to create parent committees at schools, each "distinct and with voting rights on tuition and costs," Bahar said.

She said the group will also engage in raising funds in the community to offset tuition.

"It's not just this particular increase. What about next year and the year after? If this trend continues, a lot of people will say, 'Let's just cut our losses and take our kids out.' We are decimating our community."

Withholding tuition fees "is not going to help anybody," said Seymour Epstein, executive director of the Board of Jewish Education, adding that it would be within the power of schools to refuse to register children.

While the board is "excited" over parents who are passionate about Jewish education, these parents face "a serious lack of information" that will be addressed shortly.

"These parents are consumers who have to pay for services," Epstein said. "There are all kinds of avenues they can take, like being on school boards and committees."

Son's murder prompted rabbi to help relatives of terror victims

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

When Rabbi Seth Mandell learned that his 13-year-old son and first-born child, Yaakov (Koby), was brutally murdered by Palestinian assailants, his world collapsed.

"My first response was to get away as far from Tekoa and Israel as I could," he recalled, referring to that shattering day on May 8, 2001, when Koby and his 14-year-old friend, Yosef Ishrah, were bludgeoned to death in a cave several hundred metres from their home in the West Bank community of Tekoa.

But upon reflection, Rabbi Mandell concluded he would compound the tragedy by leaving Tekoa, south of Jerusalem.

"I stayed for two reasons," he explained in an interview. "The best way for a Jew to fulfil himself is living in Israel. Living outside Israel would have been a denial of who I was. And my children love Tekoa, the community, their friends, their school."

As devastated as Rabbi Mandell and his family were by Koby's wanton murder, just six weeks shy of his 14th birthday, they decided to transform their mourning into a positive force.

Rabbi Seth Mandell

With the financial assistance of private foundations, Jewish federations and agencies, synagogues, schools and corporations in the United States, Rabbi Mandell founded the Koby Mandell Foundation.

Established in November 2001, it provides professional grief counselling to Israelis who have lost family members and relatives in Arab terrorist attacks.

Since June 2002, when the first program was launched, the foundation has helped about 1,000 people.

By facing their pain with the assistance of an empathetic support system, families can strengthen themselves in their darkest hour, said Rabbi Mandell, the foundation's president.

Convinced it has been of inestimable value, Rabbi Mandel – an American who made aliyah from Silver Spring, Md., seven years ago – plans to start a new program to assist Israelis who have been injured by terrorists.

Rabbi Mandell's wife, Sherri, a journalist, is also involved in the foundation.

She is the founder of the Mothers' Healing Retreat, which is specifically geared to counselling widows and bereaved mothers.

And now she has written a book about Koby called The Blessing of a Broken Heart, which was published recently by Toby Press.

Rabbi Mandell, who was in Toronto recently to raise awareness and funds for the foundation, said he and his wife were deeply shaken by Koby's murder.

But his death has given their lives a burning purpose, and it has reinforced their own relationship and drawn them still closer to their other children – Daniel, 14, Eliana, 12, and Gavi, 8.

Koby's death, he observed, has matured the children and endowed them with a greater understanding of the fragility of the human condition.

To Rabbi Mandell, 52, the foundation is "a vehicle to keep Koby's memory and spirit alive."

Described as smart and normal, Koby had a hard time adjusting to Israel. He missed his friends back in the United States, and he did not speak in class for two years as he tried to master spoken Hebrew. Despite the difficulties, he never complained.

Enamored of baseball and basketball, Koby followed American sports on the Internet, fancied himself as a jokester, liked to read and enjoyed hiking.

Koby's love of the outdoors proved fatal. On a lovely spring day, he and Yosef Ishrah skipped school and wandered into Wadi Haritun, a dry riverbed in the Judean Desert, "a 10-minute walk from our house," said Rabbi Mandell.

Though remote, the scenic gorge was a popular destination for local hikers. Nevertheless, Rabbi Mandell had warned Koby not to venture into Wadi Haritun without adult supervision. "But like many 13-year-olds, he went there anyway."

Police surmise the boys were attacked by three to five people and had their heads crushed by rocks. The then-Israeli defence minister, Binyamin Ben-Eliezer, promised to track down the perpetrators "one by one."

The killings, which occurred in the seventh month of the second Palestinian uprising, were condemned as "a crime" by senior Palestinian Authority official Saeb Erekat.

Rabbi Mandell, who holds dual American and Israeli citizenship and who was a technical writer after making aliyah, believes Koby and Yosef were killed between 10 a.m. and noon on that fateful day. Their battered bodies were not discovered until May 9.

The murderers have not been found, and there are no leads.

"Honestly, I don't think about it," said Rabbi Mandell, who is now Orthodox but was born and raised in a Conservative household in Connecticut.

"It's not where I focus my energies. My wife and I spend most of our time on the foundation."

Rabbi Mandell, the former director of the Hillel Foundation at the University of Maryland, has mixed feelings about the new international peace plan – the road map – that the Israeli government has accepted conditionally. If implemented, the road map would lead to a two-state solution and communities such as Tekoa might have to be abandoned.

On the one hand, he is skeptical of the Palestinians' ability to carry out their obligation to fight terrorism.

On the other hand, should the road map succeed where other plans have failed, he would be prepared to live in Tekoa under Palestinian rule, provided that the level of his personal security matches that of Jews in Toronto.

In general, Rabbi Mandell said he would be supportive of whatever political solution saves Jewish lives.

"I must say, though, I can't understand why, as a Jew, I can't live in any place I want to."

Peace or no peace, Rabbi Mandell's thoughts are always focused on Koby.

"I think of him as least every hour," he said. "It's impossible to accept that we'll never talk to him again. But we'll see him in the world to come."

Jewish interests harmed by anti-hate law: Borovoy

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Canada's anti-hate law has damaged Jewish interests, civil libertarian Alan Borovoy says.

Though useful in countering genuine hate-mongers on a couple of occasions, the law has otherwise rebounded against Jews, Borovoy, general counsel of the Toronto-based Canadian Civil Liberties Association, said in a talk last week at Holy Blossom Temple.

Supported by the Jewish community when it was enacted, the law was designed to protect Jews and other minorities from racists.

But Borovoy cast doubt on whether it was needed in the first place. "Hate mongers, then and now, are peripheral creeps whose influence on society hovers around zero."

Alan Borovoy

The last time a major Canadian political party ran an anti-Semitic candidate, it fared poorly and won only 0.6 per cent of the vote, he said.

The reference was to Social Credit, a Western populist party that once fielded Jim Keegstra, an Alberta high school teacher who claimed the Holocaust was a hoax, as a candidate.

Describing the anti-hate provisions in the Criminal Code as contentious, Borovoy said they have negatively affected French Canadian nationalists, anti-Americans, anti-apartheid activists – and Jews.

Referring to Jews, he cited several examples:

• The campus privileges of a Jewish student group at the University of Ottawa were revoked due to its support of "racist" Israel.

• Benjamin Netanyahu, the former Israeli prime minister, was prevented from speaking at Concordia University in Montreal last fall because after being labelled a war criminal.

• Daniel Pipes, a U.S. scholar who appeared at York University last January to lecture on the Arab-Israeli conflict, was warned by a Toronto police officer before his talk to be careful not to violate the anti-hate law.

In the name of opposing racism, Borovoy said, one Canadian university after another has restricted freedom of speech.

This is a troubling development, he said, because freedom of speech is the lifeblood of democracy, upon which other essential freedoms depend.

"If you can't speak your mind without being worried about the consequences, you don't really enjoy freedom of speech," he said.

Borovoy attacked the notion that domestic principles of liberalism can be transposed to world politics. He called attention to two examples, both dealing with Israel.

In the summer of 2001, the Israeli army attacked a building in the territories housing Hamas bombmakers. Amnesty International criticized the raid on the grounds of "procedural fairness," arguing that the suspects should not have been targeted because their guilt had yet to be established.

Borovoy said Amnesty's position was absurd, since it tried to use the principle of a fair trial in the jungle of international politics.

"What should Israel have done? Issued summons' for Hamas?"

He added that Israel's 1981 bombing of Iraq's nuclear reactor raised an identical issue.

Borovoy said critics of the raid were, in effect, asking Israel to commit "national suicide."

The United States' pre-emption doctrine to combat terrorism is dangerous, but it may be just as dangerous not to deploy that doctrine, Borovoy said.

The battle against terrorism should be fought with painstaking and tough-minded analysis, good intelligence and courage, he said.

On the topic of Al-Jazeera, he said Jewish interests may be harmed if the Arab satellite television station is allowed to be carried by Canadian cable companies on their digital tiers. But, he added, the interests of Jews may be similarly compromised if they are denied access to information from the Arab world.

Borovoy criticized Kofi Annan, the United Nations secretary general, and Lloyd Axworthy, the former Canadian foreign minister, for having resorted to "rule of law" arguments against the United States' recent invasion of Iraq.

And he lamented the fact that dictatorships, from the Soviet Union to China, have had a "stranglehold" over decision-making processes at the UN.

Getting beyond good intentions

The summit meeting last week in Aqaba was an historic occasion. Of that there is no doubt. Hosted by King Abdullah of Jordan, it brought together the president of the United States and the prime ministers of Israel and the Palestinian Authority. But whether the significance of the moment goes beyond the good intentions of the participants or the positive symbolism of seeing the Middle East and American leaders sharing a common platform, is clearly in doubt.

Both prime ministers spoke about the need to find a mutual accommodation between the two peoples. Ariel Sharon stated that Israel has no desire to rule over Palestinians and that it is imperative to improve the living conditions of the Palestinian people. An end to Palestinian terrorism against Israelis, however, was the condition precedent for Palestinians to achieve independent rule.

Mahmoud Abbas addressed the issue of terrorism. "We oppose terror and violent actions as contrary to our religion and inconsistent with the state we aspire to. The armed intifadah must end and we must resort to peaceful means to achieve our goals." In addition, Abbas promised to end the officially directed and sanctioned incitement against Israel emanating from Palestinian media.

Abbas' words were indeed lofty and noble. But one could not avoid the feeling that the words and even the occasion carried with them a sense of déjà vu and déjà entendu. Israelis and supporters of the peace process have heard variations of those very same sentiments solemnly and formally expressed before by Yasser Arafat on the White House lawn in Washington and at the Wye Plantation. But the words in the mouth of that Palestinian leader, at least, were duplicitous and fraudulent.

Even accepting Abbas' sincerity in Aqaba, the words will ultimately prove meaningless unless he mobilizes Palestinian society to accept them too. Barely had the microphones at Aqaba been turned off, than Hamas pledged it would not stop its violence against Israel, even as a tactical ceasefire. Islamic Jihad of course, walks in lock step with Hamas. Fatah, Tanzim and Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade, all of which are controlled by Yasser Arafat, have also refused to set aside their campaign against Israelis. Indeed, they acted on their macabre promise and killed five Israelis over the weekend.

Despite President George W. Bush's efforts to bring peace between Israelis and Palestinians, he too will ultimately fail, as his predecessor did, unless the Palestinians themselves decide to reject the inciters and perpetrators of hatred and violence against the Israelis. This is the key task that Mahmoud Abbas must undertake; otherwise his lofty words will not advance past good intentions. A ceasefire with fellow Palestinians who religiously, ideologically and emotionally oppose the very notion of a Jewish state in the Middle East is wholly insufficient. He must root them out of Palestinian society. If he does not, the Palestinians will be doomed to their statelessness and constant misery.

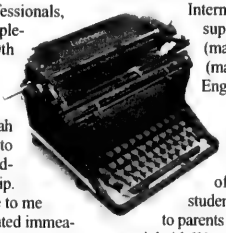
Adath Israel celebrates its centennial

The fine article on Adath Israel's centennial by staff reporter Frances Kraft, written with warmth and a keen eye for detail, calls for an addendum which I, as one of the three rabbis mentioned in the article, will gladly supply ("Adath Israel Synagogue celebrates its centennial," CJN, May 22).

Recognition of two other synagogue professionals, often generically called klei kodesh, will complement Kraft's review of the synagogue's 100th anniversary.



Alex Koenigsberg became the sexton or shamash of Adath Israel in 1953. A unique individual and a Holocaust survivor of great Torah learning, personal piety and loving dedication to the shul and its people, Mr. K. radiated Yiddishkeit, warmth and a special aura of friendship. His counsel and devotion were indispensable to me until his death in 1999. His influence contributed immeasurably to the shul's development.

Cantor Eliezer Kirshblum, now in his 36th year with Adath Israel, has stamped a distinctive artistic and devotional quality on the synagogue's religious services. He has also encouraged the pursuit of cantorial excellence in the wider community. His initiative and competence have enhanced the Adath Israel program, as exemplified by the glorious centennial concert that Kraft mentions in her article. The congregation has been enriched by his vision and leadership as educational director and involvement in many other aspects of synagogue life.

Opposes tax credit arguments

The arguments put forth in "Send Queen's Park a Message" by letter-writer Mark Greenberg in favour of the tax credit for private schools are specious and self-serving (Letters, CJN, May 29).

Greenberg cloaks his support for the tax credit by invoking the interests of "the Jewish people." He could at least be honest and say he supports the measure because it will put a few thousand dollars in his pocket. In addition, Greenberg ignores the oft-repeated truth that there is no such thing as a free lunch. The $300 million that this tax credit will cost the government will have to come from somewhere. Would Greenberg like it to come from fewer scientists to test for the next virus to hit Ontario? Or would he like it to come from reduced protection of our water quality? Or would he like to further starve our public education system? Any way he looks at it, he will have to pay for the extra money in his pocket.

Double cohort option

In view of the hundreds of students with solid grades who have not been accepted to Ontario universities this year because of the doubling of the graduating cohort, I would like to bring to the attention of your readers a very exciting option many already know about: the Rapahael Recanati International School at the Interdisciplinary Centre in Herzliyah, Israel.

IDC is Israel's first elite private college, and it enrols 3,000 of the country's most competitive students. The Raphael Recanati International School, IDC's bridge to the world, offers superb, three-year bachelor's programs in business (major in enterpreneurial marketing) and government (major in Middle East security studies), entirely in the English language.

As a graduate of the University of Toronto, I am particularly delighted at the prospect of welcoming more Canadian students to our programs. This is an intimate place (classes are typically made up of 30-40 students) where the dean knows every student and every professor is also a mentor. We speak to parents personally about everything from safety to financial aid. We are taking applications until Aug. 15. Our faculty and programs are described in depth on our Web site, www.rris.idc.ac.il.

Project Spectrum has USDS roots

It was with a great deal of interest that we read Anna Morgan's article about the Heschel school and its new Project Spectrum ("Heschel pioneers new approach to assessing kids," CJN, May 22).

Project Spectrum is based on a 10-year research project dedicated to developing an alternative approach to assessment and curriculum. It evolved from psychologist Howard Gardner's theory of multiple intelligences, which suggests that children have distinctive profiles of different abilities. They learn and process information about their world in different ways. Gardner's theory is an innovative way of looking at how children best learn.

Gardner's approaches to learning were in fact pioneered in 2000 in the grades 4 and 5 classes of United Synagogue Day Schools (USDS) as part of their Alternative Learning Strategies program. The following year, USDS established its Early Years Centre of Excellence program, which is now established in all pre-school and Grade 1 classes across the system. Teachers in the school's integrated general and Jewish studies programs observe and document students' learning styles, and provide opportunities to allow different approaches to learning similar materials.

As education consultants who have been involved in the USDS initiatives, we have been excited and gratified by the innovative approaches in classrooms and by the interest of parents who want to understand how their children learn best.

We are pleased that Gardner's philosophy is being explored in another day school and look forward to the day when it is reflected in other schools as well.

Perspectives

Locating Mount Sinai

In last week's Perspectives essay, archeologist Emmanuel Anati began describing his theory, based on evidence his expedition team has found in the Negev Desert, that Har Karkom is the Mount Sinai of the Bible. The team's research is sponsored by the Centro Camuno di Studi Preistorici, Italy, in co-operation with the Antiquities Authority and the Archeological Survey of Israel, and supported by the cultural relations department of the Italian Ministry of Foreign Affairs. This week, he concludes his argument.

By EMMANUEL ANATI

At the edge of a living site, at the foot of Har Karkom (Site HK/52), we found a group of 12 pillars or standing stones facing a platform. It reminded us of a passage in Exodus (24:4): "And Moses... built an altar under the hill (or mountain) and 12 pillars, according to the 12 tribes of Israel." Obviously, we are not in the position to prove that this monument was built by Moses, but the monument is there and was probably seen and interpreted as such by travellers.

By EMMANUEL ANATI

The cleft on one of the two tops at Har Karkom forms a small rock-shelter. A shelter right on the summit of a mountain is not a common feature in the Sinai Peninsula. Again, this is a topographic feature the Bible attributes to Mount Sinai: "And the Lord said, behold, there is a place by Me, and thou should stand upon a rock; and it shall come to pass, while My glory passeth by, that I will put thee in the cleft of the rock, and will cover thee with My hand while I pass by" (Exodus 33:21-22).

A Bronze Age shrine, with a stone platform or altar oriented to the east, is present on the Har Karkom plateau. Around it are footprints carved on stones in the direction of the mountaintop. In the book of Exodus, there are several references to a temple that is said to have been seen by Moses (Exodus 25:40; 26:7; 26:30; 27:8). Some biblical scholars believe that Moses may have had a vision of a "celestial" temple while on the mountain, but the Bible says there was a temple and this again is a topographic feature. Early travellers in biblical times may have recognized a sanctuary in this structure with an altar.

We found many other such parallels between biblical accounts and our archeological findings. At first, we saw them as intriguing coincidences, but as the survey went on, such coincidences became too many. The archeological finds reflect a story very similar to that described in the Bible and reveal a site that mirrors the biblical narrations on Mount Sinai. The compilers of the book of Exodus, when describing Mount Sinai, provide a wealth of topographic details that coincide with those of Har Karkom. When The Mountain of God came out in 1986, about 500 archeological sites were on record. Since then, the expeditions conducted there have more than doubled the number of sites. The mountain is likely to have served as a paramount site of worship and pilgrimage again and again in the course of millennia. If the Israelites indeed stopped at the foot of this holy mountain, they were not the only ones to do so. Also the Bible seems to give us an indication of this possibility (Exodus 3:1). Moses led the flock of Jethro to the "Mountain of God." The text seems to imply that the site was known already as the "Mountain of God" before Moses arrived there.

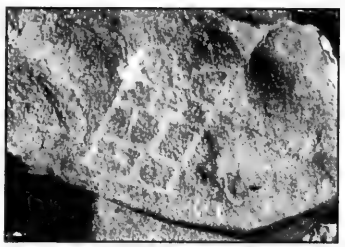
After the first shocked refusal to look at the evidence in 1984, several scholars now tend to agree that Har Karkom may well be identified with Mount Sinai. However, some questions remain open. The most puzzling one is that of chronology. Our discoveries indicate that Har Karkom was a paramount holy mountain in the fourth and the third millennia BCE. Recent archeological investigation established the same dates for Kadesh-Barnea, Arad, Jericho, Ai and other sites mentioned in the biblical accounts of Exodus and the book of Joshua. According to the findings, these localities flourished in the third millennium BCE and suffered devastation and destruction toward its end. Despite the numerous efforts made by scholars to make their findings fit the currently held dates for Exodus, if the identification of the excavated archeological sites is correct, none of those sites existed in the 13th century BCE. When archeologists found no trace of the Late Bronze Age at Jericho, some biblical scholars claimed that biblical Jericho was not there. When the archeological survey failed to find traces of the Late Bronze at Ai, Arad or at Kadesh-Barnea, the same was claimed. But could all the identifications be wrong?

In the last 100 years, many efforts have been made to find some hints of the Israelites and their exodus in ancient Egyptian literature. In the Egyptian texts that date to the New Kingdom, there is no mention whatsoever of the flight from Egypt or the crossing of the "Red Sea." Not even the general historical and social background correspond. The biblical episodes in Egypt refer to the presence of significant groups of Asians in the area of the Delta. Political changes upset the Asians' social standing. If all of this tradition has a minimal basis in historical fact, then it cannot have been totally ignored by the Egyptians. And in fact it was not ignored. The relevant texts do not date to the New Kingdom at all, but to the Old Kingdom. It is our opinion that the archeological evidence at the above-mentioned sites, the tribal social structures described in the Bible, the climatic changes described by the episodes of drought and the ancient Egyptian literature all seem to indicate that the events and situations that may have inspired the biblical narrations do not date to the 13th century BCE but rather to the late third millennium BCE.

As already stressed by several authors, the Egyptian literature of the late Old Kingdom and of the First Intermediate period, between 2300 and 2000 BCE, contains many points of contact with the biblical narrations. This aspect has been discussed in detail in The Mountain of God. Another Egyptian text related, in the versions known to us up to the 20th century BCE, the Sinuhe narrative, clearly has much in common with the biblical story of Moses, who escaped to Midian, where he "married" in the family of Jethro. It is difficult to believe these parallels can be a series of pure coincidences. It seems, in fact, that there was a common matrix to these two accounts, which cannot be later than the oldest known text of the story.



A rock engraving called "Tablets of the Law"

Above all, the archeological evidence in the Sinai Peninsula specifically excludes the possibility of the presence in the area of tribal ethnic groups such as the Midianites, Amalekites, Amorites, Horites and Israelites, from the 20th to the 12th centuries BCE. Palaeo-climatologists indicate a period of severe draught, and archeologists have shown that the desert areas of the Near East were practically abandoned by man between the 20th and the 12th centuries BCE.

This evidence is further supported by finds in Jordan, where the presence of large human communities and vast activity in the Early Bronze Age and the beginning of the Middle Bronze Age, in the third millennium BCE, bear patterns similar to those recorded at Har Karkom. Like in the Negev and Sinai deserts, also in Edom and Moab, this archeological episode is followed by a hiatus until the Iron Age in the 12th century BCE. The evidence shows that by then, the Israelites were already agriculturalists and villagers in the Holy Land. If there had been an exodus, it must have taken place well before the age of Judges. Inevitably, this means before the arid period when the Sinai Peninsula had no tribal life. The biblical account of the Exodus describes an area with an intense tribal life.

Considering these various factors together, it seems that the biblical narratives reflect what archeological research has discovered at Har Karkom, Beer Karkom and Kadesh-Barnea, as well as at Jericho, Ai, Arad, Edom, Moab and elsewhere. If the epic described in the books of Exodus and Numbers relies on even a minimal historical matrix, and if indeed there was an exodus with stops at the foot of Mount Sinai and at Kadesh-Barnea, then its chronological context can only refer to the Bronze Age Complex (BAC) period, during which Har Karkom was a holy mountain of exceptional importance. The documentation gathered through archeological research at Jericho and Ai, the comparisons with Egyptian literature, and the actual finds at Har Karkom all seem to imply that the biblical narratives have some historical background referring to the era of the Exodus. Thus the age of Joshua, beginning at Gilgal, marked the twilight of the Early Bronze Age. This is when the epoch of Moses ends, an epoch that both culturally and historically belongs to the Early Bronze Age: about one millennium before the dates assumed in what has so far been the conventional chronology.

When my father died two years ago, I recited the traditional mourner's prayer, the kaddish, faithfully, twice a day for 11 months. I did it for my father, in filial respect, to honour him. I expected it to be a great burden, but I realized a great benefit.

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

Given his cardiac history, we anticipated Dad's death. A few years ago, I wrote to my father asking him two questions: I asked him to forgive me and I asked if he wanted me to say kaddish. When he did finally die, I knew that he wanted me to say kaddish, even though I was a daughter and not a son. It was very important to me that I perform this ritual according to his wishes.

That knowledge sustained me when things got difficult. And they did get difficult, for I was a female reciting a prayer reserved for males, especially in Orthodox synagogues.

Since I travelled frequently that year, I prayed in different places and circumstances. Many were not pleasant. Some synagogues had no place for me: one congregation put my chair in front of the men's bathroom.

Even in synagogues that supposedly authorized women to say the kaddish, I was made to feel unwelcome. Often, my recitation annoyed male worshippers. At times, I could not hear and so could not join in with the mourner's kaddish. Every now and then, I would find men sitting in the women's section during daily prayers. They did not appreciate my presence, as it forced them out.

Thankfully, my experience in Montreal was the antithesis of my experiences elsewhere. In my shul, the Orthodox Spanish and Portuguese synagogue, I was fully accepted. I was never made to feel excluded or irrelevant. I was never ignored. On the contrary, my kaddish was heard and responded to. I may not have been counted in the minyan, but I counted. And my father's name was cherished and honoured.

My experiences were not unique. Many women have found similar hardship and receptivity.

But the unanticipated benefits were startling. I enjoyed being in synagogue. Yes, getting up early was hard and it complicated my work day. Yes, I had to rush home in the winter and I was always pressed for time. But after years of private personal prayer every morning, I relished prayer with a community – so much so that I continue to go every morning.

I found the kaddish helped me to mark time, both personal and communal. It helped me to mourn and deal with Dad's death. It assisted in the preservation of his memory. He was alive to me in that space and still is.

I did it for Dad – it was my obligation, yet I benefited. Isn't that wonderful.

Wars over the Wall

To learn that Israel's Supreme Court ignored the merits of the case of "Women of the Wall" and agreed they could pray at the Kotel as long as they avoided the familiar plaza facing its long expanse was disheartening, to say the least. The vulgar behaviour of opponents of women's prayer groups obviously had its affect, driving women away from an area belonging to all Jews.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

The vicious attacks of the thugs that cause the disturbance are well documented. I am shocked that the court abdicated its responsibility and caved in, rather than insisting that civility prevail.

I have had many wonderful experiences at the Wall, some on the disputed plaza, others on the site to which women's and mixed prayer groups have been relegated.

I first saw the Kotel in 1963, when I visited a Jerusalem then governed by Jordan. The Kotel at that time was hidden under centuries of refuse, with houses crowded up to it, leaving only a small passage through which one could approach. Garbage and dirt were its hallmarks. I returned next in 1971 with my family, rousing them at sunrise to rush pell-mell through the shuk to a liberated Wall, just waking up from its centuries of neglect and vandalism.

During a sabbatical in Israel in 1974-75, we often went to the Kotel for havdalah, and celebrated the powerful ceremony where thousands of cohanim gathered to bless the people. Yet, over the years, I saw that women were crowded into a small section, and the Kotel became a Wall dominated by haredim who, along with many others, I fear to say, turned this construction of the murderous Herod into a sacred spot only they could own.

For readers who are not familiar with the geography of the Kotel, I will paint a word picture. The Kotel is not a part of the temple, as some think. It is a retaining wall that Herod built to hold up a mass of dirt. He erected his legendary temple complex on top of this mountain of packed earth. This retaining wall runs on the west side of the mount from near the Dung Gate (south of the platform on which the Temple and other buildings stood) northward to where the Antonia fortress stood. The wall had no sacred function in antiquity, but because for many generations it was as close as Jews could come to the Temple site, it became a symbol of what we had lost. But it is not a holy place – we make it holy by our actions, which, I am afraid, have not been conducive to holiness.

> 'I remembered the feelings of awe I had so many years before'

Most of the wall remains under buildings erected through the centuries. It can be reached by following a narrow underground passage. Only a small part of the wall is uncovered. It runs from the edge of the large plaza we see in pictures south to the southern edge of the wall.

An artificial ramp (going up to the Temple Mount) cuts the wall into two parts – the larger is the plaza, the smaller is now in the archaeological park, dominated by Robinson's Arch (which originally supported a stairway leading up to the top of the mount). Along that part of the exposed wall runs a street that in Temple times was a lively shopping area, and you can still see the shop doorways and walk on pavement from the Second Temple period.

It is on that pavement, near the arch, where I davened last year on Shavuot as the sun rose over the Temple Mount in the east. Standing on the Herodian street, where stones from the Temple still lie in a heap where they fell as the Temple burned 2,000 years ago, was a moment of illumination for me.

When I emerged from the site, I remembered the feelings of awe I had so many years before, when the Kotel belonged to every Jew. Not just to haredim, not just to men, but to every Jew.

For years we were prevented by our enemies from praying at this place. To allow a few to decide for the many what is and is not permitted returns us to those days when we crept up to the Kotel at our peril.

That the highest court in Israel has forgotten this is, well, criminal.

It's OK to watch the news, and other observations

I had a strange realization the other night while watching the national news on television. For the first time in many, many months, some of the world's more hopeful and interesting news was emanating from the Middle East.

Stuart Slayen in Winnipeg

The news lately has generally been grim, even depressing. We've seen disturbing footage of cow carcasses being dumped into landfills following the mad cow scare, raising questions about the safety of our food. We read and hear daily about how the SARS puzzle is proving extremely difficult to solve. As spring turns into summer, we learn more about the threat of West Nile virus. The situation remains unsettled in Iraq and there has been terrorism in Morocco and Saudi Arabia.

Yet, within this troubled context, there is new hope for peace in the Middle East.

The international community has a renewed interest in the region and Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas are talking to each other and are seemingly willing to take risks and make change.

While Israel and the Palestinians are still far from living in harmony, knowing that there are serious talks underway once again feels like an emotional relief – a chance for people around the world to take a break from feelings of despair and hopelessness that have come to characterize the Mideast.

I think many people would describe themselves as cautiously optimistic about this latest peace effort. The fact is, though, it could all change on a dime. And with major summits scheduled between the time I've written this and the time you are reading this, much may in fact have changed. Such is the nature of Middle Eastern discourse.

For now, though, reading and hearing about Israel in a hopeful and positive light is a good feeling that we haven't had the opportunity to experience in quite some time.

I had an interesting Sunday last week. I attended a large synagogue service in the morning (a bar mitzvah permitted that day because it was Rosh Chodesh Sivan) and a Christian wedding that afternoon in a church.

Even though the two religions seemed to have switched their regular time slots for the day, I was struck by the similarity in the tones of the events.

In paying tribute to the bar mitzvah boy in the morning, his father recalled a an incident in which his son acted admirably, like a mensch. After that, the father noted, he knew that his son would grow up all right.

Later that day, in toasting the bride, her proud father told a story of his daughter's youth that led him to the same observation—that she, too, would be all right.

After hearing a similar message twice in the same day from two proud dads, I learned to keep my eyes open for those telling moments with my own children. I was also reminded that while theologies and cultures may differ, values can be similar.

* * *

Last month, I attended the annual concert of Winnipeg's Sarah Sommer Chai Folk Ensemble (or "Chai," for short). The singing and dancing troupe has been around for 39 years and remains one of Winnipeg's most highly-regarded cultural performance groups.

Chai features an exceptional live orchestra, a small group of highly skilled singers and a couple dozen youthful dancers.

I hadn't been to a Chai show in a few years and I found that getting lost in Israeli and Jewish music (that is, music that wasn't from a children's CD) is extremely powerful.

Hebrew is rich and melodic, even when spoken. When accompanied by voice and instrument, it is powerful.

The Kirshner File

The unfinished business of restitution

Shortly after the Potsdam Conference in Germany in August 1945, the Allies began returning Jewish property looted by the Nazis. The chief beneficiaries of these early restitution programs were states rather than individuals and families.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The injustice was compounded when the Iron Curtain of communism fell over eastern Europe and all private property was nationalized.

The picture, however, was not completely black.

In 1952, West Germany, Israel and the Claims Conference signed the Luxembourg agreements under which the Germans would pay more than $60 billion (all figures US) in reparations to 500,000 Holocaust survivors around the world. And in the 1960s and 1970s, Swiss banks released $6 million in dormant accounts to their rightful owners.

But it was not until the mid- and late 1990s that the festering restitution issue was seriously addressed on a universal basis. Thanks to the fall of communism, the opening of archives, the transformation of communist dictatorships into democracies and the high-level engagement of the United States in post-Holocaust affairs, justice could finally be done.

Stuart Eizenstat, a senior official in the Clinton administration, was a pivotal player in this belated but important process.

As the State Department's special envoy for property restitution, Eizenstat negotiated historic agreements with eastern European governments that were part of a broader American policy of encouraging the rule of law, respect for private property and tolerance for minorities. By virtue of his position, Eizenstat was also drawn into talks with Switzerland, Germany, Austria and France over these very contentious issues.

Eizenstat, who recounts his experiences in an edifying book, Imperfect Justice (Public Affairs), took on these onerous tasks when he was based in Brussels as ambassador to the European Union.

The job was offered to him by Richard Holbrooke, the U.S. assistant secretary of state for European affairs. Holbrooke had come under pressure from Edgar Bronfman, the president of the World Jewish Congress and a friend of former U.S. president Bill Clinton, to settle these unresolved questions.

Eizenstat faced five interlocking problems in eastern Europe: competing wartime claims, government complicity in appropriating valuables, the nationalization of property, the refusal of governments to return secular property and the rivalries between local Jewish communities and the World Jewish Restitution Organization.

Despite these barriers, Eizenstat broke through with a series of successes, some in unlikely places. But, as he adds, the battle for confiscated property – from communal buildings in the Czech Republic to synagogues in Ukraine – has yet to be completely won.

As Eizenstat puts it, "The Swiss government was not co-operative. Only through the diplomatic efforts of the U.S. government, threats of sanctions and boycotts by lawyers and Jewish organizations, class-action lawsuits and heated negotiations did my colleagues and I help produce results far beyond anyone's expectations."

The negotiations with Switzerland produced unintended consequences, damaging the United States' relationship with Switzerland, reviving open anti-Semitism and forcing the smug Swiss to re-examine their past.

Initial talks got off to a rocky start when the president of the Swiss Bankers Association offered Bronfman a settlement of $32 million, a paltry sum indeed.

Naturally, Bronfman was offended. "They thought we were a bunch of schnorrers," he fumed. "They just wanted to get rid of us."

This unpleasant encounter convinced Bronfman that the Swiss needed to be pressured. So the services of Gus D'Amato, a pugnacious New York Republican senator, were called upon.

Inevitably, a plethora of lawyers came on the scene. Eizenstat, who is less than complimentary about their motives and operating procedures, describes them as "a witches' brew of egos and mutual jealousies." As far as he is concerned, the majority "were in it for the money."

In his view, the acrimonious dispute might have been resolved expeditiously had the banks and the Swiss government agreed on an agenda.

While he is at it, Eizenstat does not resist the temptation to dwell on Switzerland's war time neutrality, such as it was.

The Swiss, he says, repeatedly violated their neutral status by allowing German troops and German trains to cross their borders, by selling Germany arms and munitions and by laundering Nazi-purloined gold.

Eizenstat acknowledges that Bronfman's demand for $3 billion to settle all claims was "utterly out of bounds." He similarly dismisses the banks' revised $300 million bid.

In the end, the mutually acceptable figure was $1.25 billion, but until a compromise was reached, the two sides fought like "scorpions in a bottle."

During the war, German industry forcibly employed about 10 million foreign workers, some of whom were Jews. Lawyers representing former forced and slave labourers demanded a settlement of nothing less than $30 billion, but German companies came back with a counter offer of less than $1 billion.

"The sides were so far apart that the talks were at risk of imploding," Eizenstat writes.

Eizenstat enlisted the aid of several U.S. government officials – including Secretary of State Madeleine Albright – to work on the Germans. He credits German Chancellor Gerhard Schroder for pressing German industry "to do the right thing" and for contributing taxpayers' funds to top off the payments.

Under Allied coaxing, Austria – which took comfort from the belief that it had been Adolf Hitler's "first victim" – passed seven laws to restore Jewish property. But these were full of loopholes and replete with short claims periods.

France, whose wartime treatment of its Jewish citizens was shameful, established a Shoah foundation with an initial endowment of about $375 million. It was funded by the French government, the central bank, private banks and insurance companies.

But the settlement did not satisfy American lawyers, who had filed three class-action suits against France's three main banks. Eizenstat intervened, and the case was closed.

France also found itself mired in the muck of Nazi art thefts. When the war ended, France returned 45,000 objects – paintings, drawings, sculptures, rare books, furniture and the like – to their proprietors. But in the absence of certifiable heirs, a few thousand pieces were placed in French museums, while 13,000 were sold at auctions.

At Eizenstat's suggestion, museums, commercial galleries and auction houses agreed to join forces in tracing looted art and to establish a conflict resolution system to prevent claims from deteriorating into protracted legal battles.

By every yardstick, Eizenstat acquitted himself reasonably well in all these negotiations. All told, he and his team extracted $8 billion for Jews and non-Jews who had been victimized during the Holocaust.

But, he admits, his efforts were at best imperfect. "Our negotiations were not idealized exercises in moral expiation or giant civic lessons. They were difficult, emotional and confrontational clashes over billions of dollars [and] wounded national pride."

Looking back, he is sorry that he did not press the United States sufficiently hard that property restitution became a priority in Washington's dealings with the new democracies of eastern Europe.

Turning to Israel, Eizenstat criticizes the Israelis for not having used their political clout to advance the issue of property restitution in eastern Europe. In essence, Israel feared that moves to strengthen reawakened Jewish communities there might impede aliyah.

In summing up, Eizenstat says he believes he achieved practical, political and moral successes that far outweighed the costs and disappointments. "We galvanized the world's attention on the overlooked issue of looted Holocaust-era assets, and we provided a final, if incomplete, financial accounting of the crimes of World War II."

Beyond that, he notes, he and his colleagues developed novel concepts for redressing future mass violations of human rights.

Judging by his achievements, flawed though they were, Eizenstat can rest assured that he has attained more than just a footnote in history.

Stuart Eizenstat will speak at Holy Blossom Temple on Wednesday, June 18, at 8 p.m.

There are many ways to measure excellence. Excellence is the bright smile of a child who is learning well and feeling good as a learner and as an individual. Academic excellence is also measured by external tests and competitions. Our students score consistently well in national, standarized tests. We participate in prestigious competitions such as the International Hebrew Bible Test (Chidon Hatanach), the University of Waterloo Gauss Math Competition, and the Canadian Math Contest, as well as regional contests in creative writing, public speaking and science fairs. Each year, our students win or place in these contests. We salute their remarkable accomplishments.

Conservative movement honours Toronto couple

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

When Ron and Heather Hoffman first joined a synagogue as a married couple starting their own family, they opted for a Conservative congregation, although they knew little about the denomination itself.

What they did know, Ron recalled during a recent phone interview, is that they wanted to sit together.

"But once we became involved and began to learn about the principles [of Conservative Judaism] – intellectual freedom, the importance of tradition, of Zionism and of pluralism, the kinds of things that just spoke to me – I thought, 'This is good,'" said the father of two and grandfather of one.

Ron and Heather Hoffman.

Next Monday, June 16, the Hoffmans will be honoured with the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism's Ateret Kavod award for their leadership in the movement. The reception, featuring entertainer Theresa Tova, will take place at Adath Israel Congregation, where the Hoffmans are longtime members.

Heather, a human resource counsellor, is involved in the synagogue's sisterhood, having served as a vice-president and chaired a variety of projects. Last year, she chaired the Ashkenaz Festival and has also been involved with other community organizations.

Ron, a lawyer who now works in the business world, originally became involved with Adath Israel's brotherhood, working his way through the synagogue and Conservative movement ranks. He currently chairs the Canadian Foundation for Masorti Judaism and serves as vice-president of Mercaz-Canada.

He is a board member of both the Jewish National Fund and Kolel: A Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning, to name two of the organizations he has been involved with. In 1995, he received UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Shem Tov award for community leadership.

The Ateret Kavod award was created in 2000 by the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism to honour individuals who have demonstrated outstanding leadership. Funds raised in conjunction with the award events are used for the movement's youth and young adult programs, Kadima, United Synagogue Youth (USY) and KOACH.

This year, at Hoffman's initiative, funds will be allocated both to those programs and to the construction of a community mikvah to be run under Conservative auspices.

The Hoffmans are "so committed in so many areas of the Jewish community," said Paul Kochberg, president of United Synagogue's Canadian region. "Ron is one of the strongest supporters of the Conservative movement that I know."

The couple supports youth programs because they feel "that our community has to do everything possible to ensure that our great-grandchildren will be Jewish," Ron said.

In addition, he noted, "in any new Jewish community, historically, the mikvah has been more important than the synagogue or the cemetery."

In the United States, there has been a move on the part of the Conservative movement to build its own mikvahs because many Orthodox mikvahs do not allow Conservative conversions, said Rabbi Roy Tanenbaum, president of the Conservative movement's Rabbinical Assembly, Ontario region.

Currently, Conservative rabbis in Toronto use the Reform movement's mikvah for up to half a dozen conversions a month. Although they are grateful to the Reform movement, "it's very important for our own integrity as a movement that we have a mikvah," Rabbi Tanenbaum said.

A committee has narrowed down a list of potential sites.

Solel honours Mayor McCallion

Solel Congregation of Mississauga is holding a tribute dinner on June 16 to honour Mayor Hazel McCallion on her 25th anniversary in office.

The event will raise money for five charities selected by McCallion, including Foodpath, Mississauga's largest food bank; Pathway Community programs, a non-profit group assisting families and children of Mississauga through breakfast programs and parent-child centres; The Dam Youth Drop-in for youth at risk; the Hazel McCallion scholarship for Grade 12 students to pursue higher education; and Solel Congregations Hebrew School in order to build a permanent facility.

Temple member Gavin Herman, who is co-chairing the event with his wife Shirley, said they conceived the idea for the dinner in order to find a way to move forward on the development of a permanent school facility for Temple Solel, the only synagogue in Mississauga.

With about 250 students, it is time that the school – which now rents space from the Dufferin-Peel Roman Catholic School Board – had its own facility, said Herman.

They decided to honour McCallion, 82, "because she is very involved in the community, and because she has lent her name to various causes such as Mississauga's art gala and its charity golf tournament.

"We don't know of any other time that she has been honoured, so we felt this could be a good vehicle.

"She has had a solid, close relationship with Solel's Rabbi Lawrence Englander for years, and that added to our desire to honour her."

They are expecting about 1,100 people at the dinner, which is to be held at the Mississauga Convention Centre, said Herman. Evening dinner sponsor is Biovail Corporation.

Entertainment includes singer Michael Burgess, a longtime Mississauga resident; Tina Maddigan, an alumnus of Sheridan College who is now starring in Mamma Mia on Broadway; the Mississauga Children's Choir; and The Shamrock Academy of Irish Dancers.

The Mississauga police and fire departments will be represented with the Peel Region Police Pipe Band and the Mississauga fire department honour guard.

Toronto teenager receives Chief Scout Award

By ELYSSE ZAREK
CJN Intern

Few people enjoy the winter as much as Kyle Giddens. During January's deep freeze, while many of us were swaddled miserably in coats, scarves, and hats, 15-year-old Giddens was happily camping in the bush outside St. Catharines. With his scout troop, Giddens built a lean-to between two trees and prepared a cozy floor – straw sandwiched in plastic wrap – to sleep on for two nights.

Outdoor camping is just one of the achievements that earned him the Chief Scout's Award, the highest award in the Scout Canada program for his age group. On May 22, he was presented with an award signed by Governor General Adrienne Clarkson recognizing him for his leadership skills, volunteer work and love of the outdoors.

Kyle Giddens

While many of us were lighting Chanukah candles at home in December, Giddens was in the basement of a church in the city's west end, teaching a group of elementary-school children and their parents about the story of Chanukah. He also showed them how to play dreidel and gamble for pennies with the colourful four-sided tops.

In his spare time, the Grade 9 CHAT student and Bialik graduate also volunteers every year at the Baycrest Run handing out drinks to runners at water stations, supervises arts and crafts contests at the annual Winterfest at Mel Lastman Square, and distributes gifts to needy families every December for the Toronto Star Christmas Fund.

Despite his commitments and responsibilities, Giddens enjoys being a Scout. "I'm helping others, doing stuff for the community, doing stuff I wouldn't usually do. If I wasn't part of Scouts then I wouldn't take part in that," he said.

One of his tasks as a chief scout is to watch over two younger scouts, which he admits is the most challenging part of his role. "You're responsible for your actions and have to present a leadership role for them," said Giddens.

Giddens joined the Scouts three years ago when his parents wanted him to learn new skills and get involved in the community. Since then, he's learned first aid and how to pitch a tent and has become more self-sufficient.

However, he never imagined himself getting the top award. "I didn't even think of the chief scout award," he said.

His parents are delighted with their son's achievements and impressed with his stamina for cold-weather camping. Owen Giddens accompanied his son on the first winter camping trip. "It's pretty brutal," he said. "I lasted one night."

"We're really proud of him," said his father. "It helped him mature through leadership and taking responsibility."

Sandra Giddens said that her son has become more well-rounded because of his leadership and volunteer experience. "It's more than he could have gotten from just school or camp," she said.

Rabbis, doctors discuss SARS

"If there is to be any silver lining," Rose said, "[It's that] we [now] know how to control outbreaks at hospitals in the future."

Using examples at York Central, Dwosh said SARS has exposed many underlying problems in the health-care system.

He described York Central as an "overcrowded and very busy place" with an open-concept design that made it difficult to isolate suspect and probable SARS cases from other patients.

Another problem, he said, is that "not every hospital can do everything for everyone." As a result, one of the first SARS patients in Toronto suffered kidney failure and had to be transferred from Scarborough Grace to York Central for dialysis.

Transferring patients from one hospital to another increases the possibility of spreading disease, Dwosh said. But he added that "when things are handled in the right manner, there is little chance of the genie coming out of the bottle."

Dealing with SARS has been emotionally trying on everyone involved, Dwosh said. One nurse at his hospital took early retirement after contracting the illness and another is dealing with post-traumatic stress disorder. As well, he said, many nurses are quitting and health-care workers must now deal with a general backlog in the health-care system created by restricted access to hospitals due to SARS.

Dwosh also told a poignant story about family members of an elderly SARS patient who had to make a tough choice after being told that if they said goodbye to their dying relative, they would have to go into quarantine and miss his funeral and shivah.

Rabbi Glatt cited several biblical and historical precedents to reassure the audience that humanity has overcome plagues throughout the ages.

He said it's impossible to explain why God allows epidemics like SARS to exist, but that He always has His reasons.

"If we didn't have the ability to solve this on a scientific, personal and religious basis, we wouldn't have it," Rabbi Glatt said. "God doesn't give us anything we can't handle."

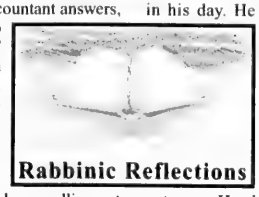
The numbers game

By RABBI YECHIEL GOLDREICH



There is an old Jewish joke about a man asks an accountant, "How much is two plus two?" The accountant answers, "How much do you want it to be?"

Jews have a long history with numbers. The beginning of the fourth book of the Torah, named Numbers, reads like a synagogue ledger, spelling out exactly who donated exactly how much, and how many were in which tribe and how were they subdivided. Painstakingly, the Torah focuses on the most minute of details.

Commentators labour to find the divine inspirational aspects of this seemingly dry patch of writing. Many early commentaries use the passages as expressions of national pride, of wistful yearning for a bygone era of Jewish greatness.

Rashi, living in Troyes, France, precariously close to the horrors of the Crusades, wrote about the armies of ancient Israel. "God counts us over again as an expression of love." The numbers are not merely facts, but rather a divine expression of affection. We are not forgotten. We count.

Nachmanidies fled Spain and arrived in a deserted, desolate Jerusalem in the 13th century. He mournfully commented on the contrast between the sanctuary in the book of Numbers and the way it was in his day. He called the lack of numbers "a palace lacking its honour guards."

In the 19th century, Rabbi Samson Raphael Hirsch read the book of Numbers in a slightly different way. He defended the Torah from the slanders of German Bible critics. He explained the nuanced meanings and symbolism of the numbers and tribal configurations. Like the financial pages, numbers and details contain a wealth of information if you know what you are looking at.

Picking up on this theme, present day Bible scholars (see www.tanach.org) pay close attention to structural, linguistic and literary detail and continue to develop new insights into Numbers that serve to inspire and enlighten. Numbers is, and are, important.

It seems odd then that elsewhere in the Torah, in Exodus, the direct counting of the Jewish people is prohibited. The book of Samuel 2 even records a plague attributed to the sin of counting individuals. The Talmud states that blessing is only found among the uncounted.

The sages reconcile this by explaining that it's not the counting per se that is the problem. Rather, it is the dehumanization that comes from being merely a number, that we must recognize that numbers do not tell the complete story.

The results of Canada's 2001 census portray Canadian Jewry as "shrinking." Is this due to happy causes or, God forbid, sad ones? Does the number gain for Jews in Nova Scotia mean the same as it does for Jews in Ontario? Like the other book of Numbers, a lot depends on the commentary. The figures themselves tell only part of the story.

In his book Hard Times, Charles Dickens puts forth the following question: if two boats sink leaving no survivors, and one had 100 passengers while the other had 200 passengers, which is the greater tragedy? The greater tragedy, Dickens maintained, is the boat that contained your loved one.

May the Almighty remove all sickness from us and increase our numbers, and may those numbers reflect the true sum of our happiness.

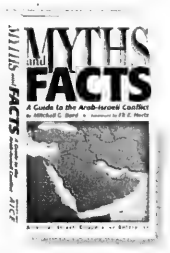
New evidence on Al-Dura killing controversy

MYTH:

The shooting of a child being protected by his father shown on TV proves Israel does not hesitate to kill innocent Palestinian children.

FACT:

Perhaps the most vivid image of the so-called "al-Aksa intifadah" was the film of a Palestinian father trying unsuccessfully to shield his son from gunfire. Israel was universally blamed for the death of 12-year-old Mohammed Al-Dura, but subsequent investigations found that the boy was most likely killed by Palestinian bullets.



An Israel Defence Forces (IDF) aerial photo of the Netzarim junction in the Gaza Strip where the boy was killed shows that he and his father took cover adjacent to a Palestinian shooting position at the junction. After Palestinian policemen fired from around the position toward an IDF position opposite, Israeli soldiers returned fire toward the sources of the shooting. During the exchanges of fire, the Palestinian child was hit and killed.

Contrary to the conventional belief that the footage of the incident was live, it was actually edited before it was broadcast around the world. Though a number of cameramen were in the area, only one, a Palestinian working for France 2, recorded the shooting. Raw footage shows a far more complex picture and raises many questions.

An IDF investigation of the incident released Nov. 27, 2000, found that Al-Dura was most likely killed by a Palestinian policeman and not by Israeli fire. This report was confirmed by an independent investigation by German ARD Television, which said the footage of Al-Dura's death was changed by the Palestinians to look as if he had been killed by the Israelis when, in fact, his death was caused by Palestinian gunfire (CNN, IDF, Jerusalem Post, Nov. 28, 2000; Jewish Telegraphic Agency, March 21, 2002).

In an article in The Atlantic Monthly this month, James Fallows revisited the story and wrote that "the physical evidence of the shooting was in all ways inconsistent with shots coming from the IDF outpost."

Fallows cited a number of unanswered questions, which have led some to conclude the whole incident was staged: "Why is there no footage of the boy after he was shot? Why does he appear to move in his father's lap, and to clasp a hand over his eyes after he is supposedly dead? Why is one Palestinian policeman wearing a Secret Service-style earpiece in one ear? Why is another Palestinian man shown waving his arms and yelling at others, as if 'directing' a dramatic scene? Why does the funeral appear – based on the length of shadows – to have occurred before the apparent time of the shooting? Why is there no blood on the father's shirt just after they are shot? Why did a voice that seems to be that of the France 2 cameraman yell, in Arabic, 'The boy is dead' before he had been hit? Why do ambulances appear instantly for seemingly everyone else and not for al-Dura?" (The Atlantic Monthly, James Fallows, "Who Shot Mohammed al-Dura?" June 2003).

Jewish Life

Journalist takes peek into world of Chabad

The Rebbe's Army: Inside the world of Chabad-Lubavitch*, by Sue Fishkoff, Random House, $40.00.

Books
Bernard Baskin

The Chabad-Lubavitch branch of Chassidism, brought to its present prominence and popularity by the late charismatic Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson, who died in 1994 at the age of 94, is perhaps the fastest growing tendency in American Judaism. There may be 30,000 Chabad Chassidim in North America and three times that number around the world. The movement can boast of 3,800 husband and wife teams of shlichim in 45 American states and 61 countries – all of them committed to bringing Jews back or closer to their roots.

In remote Katmandu, Nepal, Chabadniks host 1,500 guests every year at their seder. Annual operating costs of the Chabad empire approach one billion – and this doesn't include construction costs for new buildings that have been going up at an astonishing rate around the world.

Yet as the author of this engaging and fair-minded account points out, so much about Lubavitchers appears to be contradictory.

"They scorn popular media, but they maintain the world's first and largest Jewish Web site, which gets millions of hits a year," Fishkoff writes. "They won't shake hands with member of the opposite sex, but they move in the highest government circles. They avoid college, because Schneerson – who himself studied at the Sorbonne and the University of Berlin – decided that America's college campuses would have a detrimental effect on his followers. Yet they jet all over the world on a moment's notice and live in the most exotic, un-Jewish locales. They are zealous about their own kashrut, but they open their arms to Jews who eat pork and drive on Shabbat."

There are, of course, opponents to the zealous Chabad outreach program. Many dislike the movement's insistence on lighting giant menorahs in public places, an action they consider contrary to the American division between church and state. Their refusal to recognize some Jewish denominations puts the group at odds with the majority of North American rabbis and most national Jewish organizations.

Perhaps most serious of all these matters is the lingering, divisive issue of Rabbi Schneerson as the long awaited Messiah. Rabbi Norman Lamm, who recently retired as president of Yeshiva University, was aghast: "Belief in a saviour who dies and is reborn to lead the way to salvation is a major theological distinction between Judaism and Christianity… The whole polemic we've had with Christianity for 2,000 years is that we say a Mashiach who did not accomplish world peace, who did not accomplish the redemption of Israel and the world, is not Mashiach. And here we're told that [the Rebbe] can be. If that's the case, why were we so reluctant to accept Jesus?"

Actually, the number of his followers who cling to the notion of the Rebbe as Messiah, including an overwhelming number of shlichim, are largely in a decline.

Fishkoff, an award-winning journalist, spent a year interviewing the dedicated emissaries. She travelled from Anchorage to Miami and explored their inner lives, sense of mission, relationship to marginal Jews and their inevitable blind spots.

Predicting the future of Chabad is a perilous undertaking. But it seems safe to predict that Chabad-Lubavitch will continue to flourish, both as a worldwide Chassidic movement with a specific philosophy and practice, as well as a successful Jewish outreach program. The teaching will continue, the Internet and print publication efforts will grow, Jews on the fringe will continue to offer money and support, and Chabad shlichim will continue to make their presence felt in the communities where they live and work.

Yiddishe Pappas (Father's Day)

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

A few weeks ago, there was a run on flower stores across the continent as mothers (including Yiddishe Mammas) got their day in the sun. Next Sunday, fathers everywhere will unwrap boxes containing ties and bottles of cologne. It's time to give Yiddishe Pappas their due.

Father's Day was first observed in the United States almost a century ago [http://www.holidayorigins.com/html/father_s_day.html], but long before, Judaism commanded Jewish children to honour and fear their parents. In an essay "Must I Obey My Parents," Rabbi Michael Gold explains the importance of the well-known mitzvah of honouring your father and the lesser-known commandment prohibiting a child from sitting in his father's chair. (As to whether Judaism requires children to obey their parents, you'll have to read the essay: http://www.rabbigold.com/faq3.html).

So what, do the rabbis say, does the Jewish father owe his children?

• A father should be careful to keep his son from lies, and he should always keep his word to his children (Talmud Sukkah 46b).

• A father must provide his daughter with appropriate clothing and a dowry (Code of Jewish Law, Even Ha'ezer 71).

• In a chassidic tale, a father comes to the Ba'al Shem Tov with a complaint that his son is forsaking Judaism and morality. He asks the rabbi what he can do. The Baal Shem Tov answers, "Love him more" [http://www.uscj. org/item96_99_462.html].

Rabbi Bruce Dollin of Denver's Hebrew Educational Alliance quotes the statement that tells the Jewish father he is "bound regarding his son to circumcise him, redeem him, teach him Torah, take a wife for him and teach him a craft. Some say, to teach him to swim as well."

Rabbi Dollin points out that nowadays, the Jewish father delegates most of these responsibilities to others (the mohel, the teacher, the swimming instructor, etc.) The statement actually points to deeper truths, he says. "Maybe teaching our children to swim is really a metaphor. Fathers are obligated to show their children how to swim, perhaps, in the sea of life. Fathers serve as a model how to enjoy life's blessings when the seas are calm, and how to work through the hard times when life's inevitable storms arrive" [http://www.headenver.org/ Sermons/Nasso_5760.htm].

I have come across several moving essays in which Jewish children remember their fathers. I recommend "A Story of Jewish Fathers, Angels and Poinsettias" by Sara Levinsky Rigler [http://www.spiritualsisters.com/messages/518.html], "Father's Day and Raw Eggs" by Jenna Tasky and "A Face in the Window," in which Rabbi Yaakov Salomon remembers his teary father peering through the window of his camp bus just so that he can savour one more glimpse of his son [http://www.aish.com/family/heart/].

For a look at fictional Jewish fathers, the Jewish Heritage Video Collection recommends Phillip Roth's Goodbye Columbus (1969) and Chaim Potok's The Chosen (1982) [http:// makeashorterlink.com/?N1F4516C4]. Not surprisingly, it also mentions Fiddler on the Roof (1971), with Chaim Topol's famous Jewish father of five daughters, Tevye [http://us.imdb.com/Title?0067093]. For a different taste of Tevye, listen to Walter Matthau read Sholem Aleichem's Chava, in which the father tries "to make sense of his beloved daughter Chava's break with the only way of life he understands" [http://www.kcrw.com/jewish /frames/jss1.html].

In "Honoring Our Fathers," Rabbi Daniel Brenner of CLAL: The National Jewish Center for Learning and Leadership has these thoughts.

• Honour your father's history. What events shaped his life?

• Honour your father's outlook. What have you learned from him?

• Honour your father's dreams. What are his hopes for you, whether realized yet or not? [http://www.beliefnet. com/story/81/story_8168.html].

Rabbi Brenner says, "On Father's Day, we honour our fathers not by comparing them to some ideal, but by acknowledging them for who they really are. We pause to reflect on their history, remember the challenges they faced and meditate on what they taught us along the way. In that, we truly live by the words 'honour thy father'… This Father's Day, reflect on the contribution fathers have made in sharing their love and guidance from one generation to the next. And if you have the opportunity, get him a bow tie – I hear they're coming back."

Jewish Toronto

A sterling history of voluntarism recognized

By DANIEL HOROWITZ

It has been said that volunteers are the lifeblood of any successful organization, and few people personify that axiom better than Toronto's Carole Sterling.

Sterling, who has been a tireless and dedicated UJA Federation volunteer for the past decade, was recently designated as the 2003 recipient of the Phil Granovsky Award for Campaign Excellence, named after the late community leader, to honour individuals who exemplify the best in UJA Federation campaigning.

"I think that this honour is amazing," says Sterling. "What makes this award so special and appreciated is because of the man it was named after. Unfortunately I never knew Phil, but everyone I talk to raves about what an incredible man he was, and what an amazing legacy he has left behind. In that same vein I can only hope that the example I set for my children will inspire them."

The Phil Granovksy Award will be presented to Sterling at the upcoming UJA Federation Annual Meeting taking place on June 17.

Sterling, a UJA Federation Board Member, has much to be proud of including her stints as a Chair of UJA Federation's Women's Campaign & Advocacy; Chair of the Walk with Israel; participation in the 1998 March of the Living; and her two year role, along with Harvey Naglie, as Vice Chair of UJA's annual campaign. She is also a member of the Vaughan Steering Committee of UJA Federation's ambitious Jewish Toronto Tomorrow initiative, a member of the Executive and Board of Temple Sinai, second Vice President of the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism, and the Regional Representative of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations.

Carole Sterling

Having been so heavily involved in Toronto's Jewish community over the past ten years, Sterling is optimistic about the future.

"Even after all these years, I am still in awe when it comes to Toronto's incredible Jewish community," she says. "How this community has rallied together and around Israel – especially over the past few years – speaks volumes about our passion, love and commitment to the State. No matter where I go in Toronto, people come up to me and ask how they can get more involved in helping with the Jewish community here, and especially in Israel. At the end of the day, Toronto's Jews realize what they need to do. That spirit certainly bodes well for the future of Jewish Toronto."

Some honest answers about SARS

As a recipient of the CHICA-Canada (Community and Hospital Infection Control Association) Award of Merit for service in the advancement of infection prevention and control, Dr. Andrew Simor has played an integral role in dealing with the outbreak of Severe Acute Respiratory Syndrome, or SARS, in Ontario and around the world. Widely respected for his research, he has received a variety of research grants in Canada and the U.S.

Dr. Andrew Simor

Dr. Simor is head of Microbiology and a consultant on infectious diseases at Sunnybrook and Women's College Health Sciences Centre in Toronto. He is also a professor in the Department of Laboratory Medicine and Pathobiology at the University of Toronto.

Prior to his address to members of the UJA Federation Maimonides Society - co-chaired by Dr. Howard Price and Dr. Irv Gottesman at Adath Israel Congregation - Dr. Simor answered a few questions about SARS, Toronto's response to the disease, and the future.

Q. Is SARS a sign of things to come in the new millennium? Should we be looking out for more of these new and mysterious viruses in the future?

A. Unfortunately I would have to say yes. SARS is just one example – West Nile Virus is another – of new and emerging infectious diseases. I have little doubt that we are going to see more and more of these viruses in the future.

Q. So, people are washing their hands more than ever due to the SARS outbreak. But surely there must be more that we can do to help put an end to this disease?

A. There is one way people can help prevent the spread of SARS, and that is by being responsible. People have always had a tendency to try and work through illness. The best thing that people can do today is, if they're sick, stay home and get better, get treatment if needed, but do not continue going to work where they face the risk of infecting their co-workers.

Q. With a second outbreak of SARS hitting Toronto recently, what went wrong? Were we too cocky or complacent once it seemed the initial outbreak had been brought under control?

A. The entire SARS problem has been very disturbing for everyone involved. After the first outbreak had occurred and things were seemingly returning to normal, many of Toronto's hospitals loosened their precautions. Still, I don't believe the re-emergence of SARS could necessarily have been prevented no matter what. I know that none of us in either public health or infectious diseases dismissed the threat too soon. We were obviously pleased at the beginning of May when the number of new SARS cases had declined, but none of us really thought it was over, not while there were still cases in various hospitals.

Q. What kind of effect has SARS had on the health care community?

A. This has been such a stressful time for all health care workers – and I stress all health care workers. From doctors and nurses to admitting staff and those in housekeeping. And the stress is not only due to the immense workload placed on everyone, but also because of the ongoing anxiety felt by those at risk in terms of their personal health and safety, as well as the safety of their families. SARS has certainly taken a heavy toll on the entire health care system.

Q. What do we, as a community, need to learn about SARS that we don't already know, and how close are we to gaining this new information?

A. There is still such a long way to go before we really gain all we need to know about this disease. First of all, from this experience it's quite clear that we need better diagnostic tools for individual patient management. Those tools are currently undergoing development, but they are not there yet. Secondly, we clearly need to better understand the virus itself to design the appropriate treatment and – ultimately – a vaccine.

Q. On the whole, how do you think Toronto has handled the SARS outbreak?

A. Overall I believe Toronto handled the SARS outbreak extremely well. On the bright side, we've learned much from this experience, most notably the importance of an adequate public health infrastructure as well as the needed resources. With health budgets falling oyer the past few years, and with health care living on the edge, this has certainly demonstrated the importance of the proper funding. Also, this outbreak showed the importance of having the collaborative efforts of a huge number of individuals in health care and in infectious diseases to properly manage this type of outbreak.

Over 300 people gathered recently at the Sheraton Centre Hotel to hear Richard Perle of the American Enterprise Institute for Public Policy Research present his views on post-war Iraq and the "road map" for peace in the Middle East. Perle was formerly with the U.S. Defence Department.

Casablanca bombings bring community closer together

By DANIEL HOROWITZ

Despite last month's terror attacks that rocked the Jewish community of Casablanca, there is no widespread feeling of panic, according to one member of Casablanca's Jewish community, but rather, a feeling of renewed unity.

Five groups of attackers - 14 in all - carried out the bombings on May 16 on several Jewish and Spanish sites, including a Jewish social club, a Jewish cemetery, a Jewish-owned restaurant, and a hotel particularly popular with Israeli tourists. In fact, the Safir Hotel had nine Israeli guests at the time of the bombing and was expecting another 200. The Israelis were in Morocco for a Lag B'Omer holiday pilgrimage.

Over 40 people were killed in the attacks, none of them Jewish, and 100 were injured. Since the bombings, there is a noticeable increase in security, military and police in the streets, particularly at "sensitive" sites such as Jewish schools and a nearby fast food restaurant.

"It may sound strange unless you live here, but in my opinion, the bombings have had a positive effect on the people of Morocco - Jews and non-Jews alike," said Casablanca resident Dorit Ben Moha during a recent interview. "For one, it made the government aware of the very high level of Islamic fundamentalist activity going on here. The bombing did not scare anybody away, maybe that is because no Jews were killed."

"There was recently a huge march of solidarity in Casablanca which started at the site of the first bombing, the hotel, and continued through the streets of Casablanca," said Ben Moha. It was such a special feeling and really showed the true spirit of Moroccans. The slogan was 'Jews and Muslims unified - it's the only solution.' All of Morocco's citizens, Jews, Christians and Muslims have come together like never before."

Still, The Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI) - UJA Federation's overseas partner - is focusing on raising enough money to subsidize Jews who do decide to leave Morocco for Israel.

Morocco's Jewish community, which boasted 250,000 members in 1948, consists of less than 5,000 today - most of them over the age of 50.

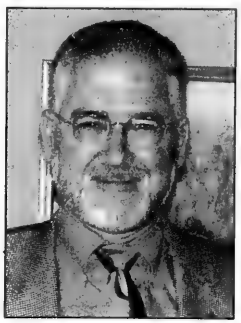
Reform movement expands

According to Uri Regev, Executive Director of the World Union for Progressive Judaism, in Jerusalem, Liberal Judaism can play a critical role in bringing secular Jews back to Judaism, particularly in Continental Europe, the Former Soviet Union (FSU), and Israel. Regev's comments were made during a special briefing held last week at the Lipa Green Building, for UJA Federation leaders.

"Liberal Judaism has a critical role to play in reconnecting these communities to Jewish life," said Regev. "We face a tremendous critical challenge, as many in these communities have been detached from Judaism for decades."



Uri Regev

"We have traveled a great distance in very few years in making progressive Judaism a viable path for Israelis. Still, there is tremendous work to be done," he said. "It is clear to us that this is not only a job for the Reform movement alone. Therefore, we are seeking partners in this effort."

Toronto philanthropists named to Order of Canada

Jewish community leaders honoured

The last year has been a particularly memorable one for two prominent members of Toronto's Jewish community known for their generous philanthropic philosophies.

Dr. Gerald Halbert receives the Order of Canada from Governor General Adrienne Clarkson.

In August 2002, Dr. Gerald Halbert was named to the Order of Canada, followed by Abraham (Al) Green who was in Ottawa just a few weeks ago to pick up his award.

The Order of Canada - this country's highest honour for lifetime achievement - recognizes people who have made a difference to Canada, from local citizens, to international celebrities,

Dr. Halbert, a strong supporter of the Canadian Jewish community, is a Past Campaign Chair of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, and Past President of UIA Federations Canada, and has been active in the development of the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life at the University of Toronto - a Jewish Toronto Tomorrow initiative. He has also helped to raise funds for and establish several research chairs at the University of Toronto and University Health Network, and is a member of the Mount Sinai Hospital Board of Governors.

Halbert received the Order in Vancouver, rather than the customary setting of Ottawa, as part of a special traveling ceremony celebrating the 50th anniversary of Canadian-born Governors General.

"When I got involved in UJA Federation back in 1960, I soon went on my first mission to Israel. That first trip really turned me on to what UJA was doing for the Jewish community, and it turned me on to Israel and its importance, too. I've been involved with UJA ever since."

Al Green, a gifted sculptor, is known by the moniker, the "Dream Maker" in recognition of his philanthropic generosity. The community-minded businessman and life-long patron of the arts has donated countless dollars to a plethora of worthwhile charities, most notably the new 350-seat, multipurpose Al Green Theatre in the new Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre, due to open later this month.

"I was completely shocked when I received the letter informing me that I was going to receive the Order of Canada," says Green, a Past UJA Federation Campaign Chair, who was informed of the honour in November 2001. "You do what you can to help the community, to give back as much as possible, but you don't look for, or expect such an honour. At least I didn't."

Al Green with wife Malka.

"It was such an exciting and surprising honour to receive this prestigious award," says Green. "The number of phone calls and letters I've received from people I hadn't spoken to in 25 years has been staggering. I am thrilled to receive this tremendous honour, but the real honour is being in a position where I can help others."

Green has donated funds and materials used to build schools, theatres, and community centres throughout the GTA. He is also behind JACS, a treatment centre for Jewish alcoholics and drug addicts.

"I love to undertake projects that nobody else has tried before," says Green.

Educator urges families to share their happiness

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Fulfillment comes from recognizing what is permanent in life, in contrast to what is ephemeral and ultimately unimportant, says writer and educator Faige Twerski.

Twerski was giving the David Rosenzweig Memorial Lecture in memory of Rosenzweig, who was murdered last year. The event was held recently at Baycrest Terrace.

The attacks of 9/11 acted as a "wake-up call," especially in America, she said. "Before that, we thought that we could count on living in a sane, predictable world. Now we realize that we can't."

What we do control, Twerski said, is how we respond to events. Tragedy can bring out the worst in us, or the best, she said, citing Chavi Rosenzweig, David Rosenzweig's widow, who has dealt with her situation with "dignity and courage."

But, Twerski asked, while everyone knows that Jews look after each other in times of trouble, "why don't we do it in good times too?"

She urged people to share friends or family's happiness, "even if it is hard for you. Congratulate someone on getting engaged, even if you wish it was you."

It's very hard to do, she acknowledged, but she said if you do it consistently, eventually you will be able to genuinely and unselfishly wish people well.

"Let's form a no fardin [don't begrudge] club," Twerski said. "Then maybe God won't have to give us wake-up calls."

She encouraged Jews to follow laws of tzniut, modesty. "When we observe these rules, we are saying that we understand that there is an essence to me – that my totality isn't what you can see," she said.

That's not to say women shouldn't try to look attractive, Twerski said. It means to not be provocative and that "it takes longer to know me than what you can see outside."

What is important is kept private, she said. "If someone asks how much money we have in the bank, we are insulted. Our person should be just as important."

In Psalms, it says that all the glory of the daughter of the king is inward, Twerski noted. This inwardness enables women to understand the essence of people and situations. "We can go beyond the illusions of the world and see the hand of God."

The people involved in the events of 9/11 recognized what was truly important in life, she said.

"When the people in the towers realized that they were going to die, their last calls weren't to their investment brokers – the calls were to their wives and children."

Chavi Rosenzweig remembered her late husband as "a gentle man and a gentleman; a mensch and a proud Jew." The audience, many of whom were family and friends, gave her a standing ovation.

The evening marked the establishment of the Toronto chapter of Em Habanim Smecha, a Jerusalem-based organization that helps single-parent families. It offers tutoring, trips, camps and companionship, as well as Rosh Chodesh and holiday gatherings.

For more information on Em Habanim Smecha, call Elana Ginz, 416-631-9966.

Mossoff stays on the phone at UJA Federation

By LAUREN KRUGEL
CJN Intern

It all started 25 years ago with a simple phone call about a receipt to Toronto's UJA office in the Lipa Green Building. Sarah Mossoff has been hooked on the organization ever since.

"You know the story of the man who came to dinner and never went home?" says the jovial 81-year-old. "People have suggested I take an insanity test."

Mossoff says she has worked in virtually every department of the UJA "except for maintenance." She currently works the phones in donor services four days a week.

Sarah Mosoff

Part of what makes Mossoff so good at her job addressing people's questions and concerns is her patience and level-headedness when dealing with people, says friend and co-worker Susan Jackson.

"Listening is key," Jackson says.

For Mossoff, the goal is simple.

"When we get off the phone with someone, we make sure they're satisfied," she says. "We try to make everybody as comfortable as possible."

Jackson says there is a running joke within the UJA office that whenever unusual or crazy calls come through on the switchboard, they are directed to Mossoff first.

Mossoff remembers one time an older gentleman left an amusing message on the organization's voice mail.

"Hello? I want to speak to the UJA," says Mossoff in a mock-Yiddish accent, imitating the caller. "I want you should call me back."

She says the man then exclaimed, "Oy! I forget my phone number," apologized and hung up.

Mossoff traced the call, contacted the man and helped him out.

Mossof says she has stayed with the organization for so long because of her "two loves."

Her first love, she says, is Israel. She grew up in a Zionist household and followed her strong family tradition of supporting the Jewish homeland.

The mother of two and grandmother of four speaks with pride about her family, which she says is her most important achievement.

She says even her 21-year-old granddaughter, Elenna, has gone to Israel on the Birthright program.

"Like a ball of fire, she took to the whole thing," she says.

Mossoff says her work at the UJA has given her a great opportunity to learn about the Jewish state.

"I say that the thing I like best is that I'm right at the source for my information about Israel. Each person who comes along has a new thought."

Mossoff says her second love is the group of people she works with day-to-day in the office.

"There's something about the place… like a warmth," she says. "It's like a world unto itself. It's absolutely amazing."

But not all days are perfect, she says. Like any place of work, it has its frustrations and difficulties.

"You got me on a good day," says Mossoff. "It's not la la land. It's hard working."

Had she chosen to work anywhere else, Mossoff says she would have retired a long time ago. It's the nature of the organization that keeps her going.

"I get a thrill if someone phones in with an increase in pledges," she says.

Sometimes notes arrive in the mail from non-Jews who say they understand the struggle Jews are facing. Occasionally cheques are sitting at the bottom of these envelopes.

Why I don't officiate at same-sex marriages

By RABBI DOW MARMUR

Guest Voice

A rabbinic colleague informed her friends recently that she is getting married to another woman. A Conservative rabbi serving a Conservative congregation in the United States will officiate. Performing same-sex ceremonies is, therefore, not an issue for Reform rabbis alone. Some time ago, the Jerusalem Report carried a discussion between a Conservative rabbi and myself in which I represented the conservative (small "c") position.

It's therefore reasonable to assume that liberal rabbis in Canada who favour officiating at same-sex marriages come from all the non-Orthodox groups in the community. Though I regard myself as no less liberal than the next Conservative, Reconstructionist or Reform rabbi, I don't perform same-sex ceremonies. The following are some of my reasons.

Firstly, not every problem in life has a solution. Though we must respect the predicament of gay and lesbian couples, we are also obligated to heed traditional norms. For better or worse, Jewish tradition strongly affirms and celebrates heterosexual marriage and stresses the importance of procreation. There seems to be no room for alternatives. Same-sex couples who take Judaism seriously are, therefore, bound to live with unresolved tensions. But then, most people, including heterosexual religious Jews, live with tensions and inconsistencies. It's yet another indication of human frailty.

This is in no way to be understood as an endorsement of the harsh biblical laws against homosexuality. We know enough to recognize homosexuality as a legitimate human propensity to which no social stigma should be attached. We also know that marital stability eludes all kinds of unions, including heterosexual Jewish marriages, and can be found in alternative lifestyles as much as elsewhere. But tradition doesn't provide for the celebration of same-sex unions and it's questionable whether rabbis, however well-intentioned, can claim that right.

Secondly, as a Reform Jew I recognize the need to reform, even set aside, Halachah, Jewish law. Yet I believe that Jewish tradition must be affirmed unless there are overwhelming reasons not to do so. In many cases, tension between personal needs and traditional demands is preferable to an inauthentic solution that confuses the affirmation of certainty with the quest for truth, which by its very nature is often beyond human grasp.

I know there are rabbis who believe that the imperative to affirm same-sex unions warrants setting aside tradition for the sake of bringing Jews closer to Judaism, but I don't share their conclusion. If I did, I would officiate at marriages between Jews and non-Jews on similar grounds, and I don't.

Thirdly, rabbis, irrespective of denominational affiliation, are teachers and, in that capacity, exponents and custodians of Jewish tradition. That a rabbi should also be a mensch, a caring and compassionate human being, is a given. But performing the role of pastor (not a Jewish term), seeking to meet the needs of as many members as possible of the "flock," is secondary. When the pastoral takes precedence over the educational, our Jewish value system may be at risk. Rabbis need not aspire to be "gurus" or "wunder rebbes" who dispense blessings on demand. In the Jewish scheme of things, charisma is a poor substitute for authenticity.

Fourthly, authenticity takes precedence, because in Judaism the collective shapes the individual, not the other way around. Rabbinic actions must be seen in the context of their impact on k'lal Yisrael, the Jewish polity, not only on the select few. That's one reason, incidentally, why I remain opposed to patrilineal descent as a criterion of Jewish status.

Fifthly, I find it helpful to distinguish between tzedek, justice, and kedushah, holiness. Civil society, in its shaping of laws and statutes, is the custodian of the former. Holiness, on the other hand, is unique to our religious tradition. Jews are commanded in the Torah to be kedoshim, holy (in the plural), because God is holy. The challenge of religious life is to imitate God while living among people. Such imitation defines kiddushin as a heterosexual marriage. The attempt to sidestep the issue by using a different terminology, such as "same-sex unions," is inadequate.

As liberal rabbis, whether or not we perform such unions, we have every reason to ally ourselves with those in Canada who seek equal rights for all citizens, irrespective of sexual orientation. Those who wish to describe themselves as couples, homosexual or not, should be allowed by the state to be so registered, whether or not they are married.

There's also a case for Jewish congregations to accept gay and lesbian couples, especially if the congregations don't ask for proof of marriage from heterosexual couples who join them. There is no reason for the Jewish community to discriminate against any Jew who seeks affiliation and participation.

The only issue is Jewish marriage, and, unlike social justice, kiddushin is a religious category that goes beyond individual rabbinic discretion.

Bat mitzvah girl helps raise genetic disease awareness

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Caroline Just decided at age 11 that instead of having a one-weekend event for her bat mitzvah, she wanted to do something "that would have a lasting effect."

The Grade 7 student at Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto is raising awareness about genetic testing for familial dysautonomia (FD), a malfunction of the autonomic nervous system, which controls involuntary bodily functions. It is usually fatal before age 25.

She spoke to her own Grade 6 class, then a second one, and to two chapters of Jewish Women International, as well as at a synagogue luncheon with her mother, Shirley Katz, a family doctor.

Last year, Caroline presented a scholarship at Montreal's Carlyle School in memory of her sister Stephanie, who attended Carlyle and died of FD just shy of her eighth birthday, before Caroline, now 13, was born.

On June 17, Caroline will make a brief presentation at National Council of Jewish Women's fundraiser at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, when Dr. Marla Shapiro gives a lecture titled "Living Well: Achieving Balance in Your Life." Proceeds will support NCJW's national Jewish Genetic Awareness Project, which promotes testing for Tay-Sachs disease, Canavan disease and FD, all genetic diseases that have a higher incidence among Ashkenazi Jews than most other ethnic groups.

One in 29 Ashkenazi Jews is a carrier for FD, about the same frequency as Tay-Sachs, said Katz. FD, also known as Riley-Day Syndrome, is found virtually exclusively in the Jewish community. There have been over 550 cases since it was first described in 1949, she added.

In honour of her bat mitzvah, Caroline's family has funded an information Web site, www.whatsinyourgenes.com, and established a fund at NCJW.

Caroline had mentioned to her mother how nice the NCJW volunteers were when her Grade 6 class helped pack baskets for the organization's annual Passover food drive. Once Katz told her that NCJW had organized testing clinics for Tay-Sachs and Canavan in Oct. 2001, and that genetic testing was now available for FD, Caroline knew what she wanted to do for her bat mitzvah year.

Typically, she discusses her parents' story – how they met in medical school at McGill University, and their experience with Stephanie, who would now be 23. Then she talks science, tossing out phrases like "autosomal recessive inheritance" with the confidence of a medical professional.

She is often asked whether prospective parents should bother with testing if they already have healthy children. For Caroline, the answer – affirmative – is obvious.

If both parents are carriers, they have a 25 per cent chance of having a baby with two defective genes, both of which must be present for the baby to have the illness, she says. In the other 75 per cent, the dominant healthy gene prevails, although the presence of a recessive gene means the disease may be passed on to the next generation.

A simple blood test for the FD gene is now available in doctors' offices in Ontario. There is no charge to the patient, and testing is usually performed for Tay-Sachs and Canavan at the same time.

The FD test is expected to be available at the Montreal Children's Hospital in the next month or two, Katz said in a joint interview with her husband and daughter at their home. The couple also has a son Robbie, 17, who like Caroline, was born healthy. The family moved here from Montreal in 1997.

Katz and her husband, Norman Just, came up with Stephanie's diagnosis on their own after spending a full day in the medical library when Stephanie was 11 months old.

Some FD patients can function "close to normally," said Just, but Stephanie's case progressed from an initial "failure to thrive" to such an onslaught of severe symptoms that her parents found it hard to imagine anything worse.

In her final year of life, Stephanie was in and out of hospital almost weekly. At home, the medical set-up was like a "virtual intensive care unit," recalled Katz.

By age 6, Stephanie had become blind due to lack of tears, requiring two corneal transplants. An inability to feel pain meant that she didn't know when she broke her leg.

Common FD symptoms also include frequent lung infections and an inability to control temperature and blood pressure.

"I think the key now is to prevent the disease," Katz said. "We're the perfect example of the need to test Ashkenazi Jews, even if there's no family history."

"We're very proud of Caroline," said Just. "In some ways I was disappointed when she didn't want the bat mitzvah, because I like the idea of bringing family together for a simchah, but when she came up with something so meaningful, it was really very, very positive."

Is Caroline finished with her project now that her bat mitzvah year is over? "I know it has to continue," she said. "I'm just really getting started."

Environment is Kool's abiding passion

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Rick Kool is all set to launch a new post-graduate degree program at Royal Roads University in British Columbia.

A zoologist and ecologist, he designed the MA course in environmental education and communication and will start teaching it Aug. 11.

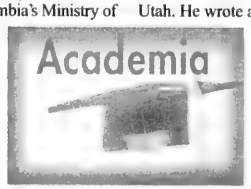
He is on a one-year leave of absence from his job as an environmental education specialist at British Columbia's Ministry of Water, Land and Air Protection, and he is an adjunct professor at the University of Victoria's graduate school and faculty of education.



"My research interests are broad, from learning in informal milieus like museums to philosophical explorations in environmental education," he explained. "I can't say I've run across a subject that didn't in some way interest me."

Royal Roads, situated on a bucolic campus just outside Victoria, was founded in 1995 as Canada's only university exclusively offering applied and professional programs, primarily at the master's level.

In Kool, Royal Roads chose a scholar who has immersed himself in environmental issues.

"Even though I grew up in the middle of Boston, I've always been interested in nature," he said.

When he was 10, he and his parents – Samuel, a television repairman, and Hester, a Dutch child survivor of the Holocaust – moved to a small beach town south of Boston.

It was a fortuitous stroke of luck for a boy drawn to the outdoors. As he put it: "That allowed me to really become a naturalist."

Kool's high school biology teacher was also a formative influence.

At the University of New Hampshire, Kool majored in zoology. "I was fortunate to find a work-study grant with a biologist who studied tiny organisms, things like paramecium or amoeba, living in marine environments."

Kool's professor introduced him to the life of a biological scientist and the "wonders and mysteries" of a hidden, yet vitally important, world.

In 1971, having never been west of New England, he drove to British Columbia. "After a month, I knew I had come home, and never considered leaving. I became a Canadian citizen as soon as they would let me."

Enrolling at the University of British Columbia, Kool earned an MSc in zoology while working on a project on how lakes work ecologically.

At UBC, Kool was a teaching assistant. "I loved teaching and I was reasonably good at it," he said. "When one of my lab partners told me he had enrolled in the faculty of education's one-year teaching preparation program, I decided to do the same."

Bitten by the teaching bug, Kool took a doctoral degree in curriculum and instruction at Brigham Young University in Provo, Utah. He wrote a thesis on the relationship between "what we know and what we do with what we know."

It was a fascinating exercise, he said.

"My research began with an interest in young environmental activists and how they related what they knew with what they did.

"While I was doing this, the movie Schindler's List came out. Through a series of events, I finally asked my mother how she had survived in Holland and who had hidden her."

Kool tracked down the family that saved her. For him, it was a revelatory moment.

"And then I understood that, inasmuch as my mother was not meant to live, I was not meant to exist either. My existence hinged on the moral actions of a Dutch family that understood that knowledge without action is nothing. The Talmud is also rich in discussions about the relationship between knowing and doing."

Having finished his studies at Brigham Young, Kool taught science at a secondary school in the Vancouver Island town of Ucluelet.

Then he became a biology and ecology instructor at Douglas College in New Westminster and a post-secondary teacher at the University of Victoria.

Asked whether it was difficult making the transition from high school to university teaching, he said, "Teaching is hard work, yet truly good work. The transition was not so hard. I just kept on growing and learning."

Joining British Columbia's civil service, Kool developed the government's environmental education and park interpretation programs, and managed the public programs department at the Royal British Columbia Museum.

He expects to return to his job at the ministry next year. "My secondment to Royal Roads is for one year, till January 2004, but hope springs eternal and perhaps I will be able to stay on."

Having spent some three decades studying the environment, Kool has reached the conclusion that Canada is remiss in managing it.

"The main environmental problem we face as a nation is that our present lifestyle is drawing down on our natural capital. We do not yet know how to live within nature's resources. We live as if there are no limits to our use of resources."

Canadians are conscious of the environment, but in Kool's estimation, that is not enough. "Simply being aware means little if we don't do something significant to reduce our impact on the environment."

Invoking Judaism to hammer home his point, he observed, "Jewish tradition always stresses the importance of the deed."

Kool, 53, is on the board of directors of Victoria's venerable Congregation Emanu-El. His wife, Enid Elliot, is also a teacher, specializing in early childhood education.

'Occupation' is a legally neutral term

Ariel Sharon's assertion May 26 that Israel is in "occupation" of the West Bank and Gaza Strip sent shockwaves through the political establishment in Israel and created confusion among many of Israel's supporters in the Diaspora.

In reaction to criticism from both the Israeli right (among whom Sharon is ordinarily thought to belong) and some government legal experts, the Israeli prime minister subsequently steered clear of the word. But he persisted in saying that Israel cannot continue to rule another people (New York Times, June 2).

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Some journalists, conscious of the linguistic minefield of Israeli-Arab politics, are confused about whether to call the territories "occupied" or "disputed." Less diligent journalists, especially those with a pro-Palestinian bias, don't hesitate to use the inaccurate "occupied Palestinian territories."

As a group of New York Times reporters properly pointed out (in an article May 11 on the journalistic fraud of former New York Times reporter Jayson Blair), the "cardinal tenet" of good journalism is the search for truth. So let's ask: what is the truth about the term "occupied"?

Former U.S. diplomat and legal scholar Eugene Rostow, known for his conservative views on Israel, wrote the following in Commentary magazine in January 1990: "The rule of international law is surely that [Israel's] military presence is an 'occupation' implying certain rights and obligations. The courts and chancelleries of the world have treated Israel as an occupying power ever since 1967. Israel itself says it is more than an occupying power but a claimant as well, having acquired and held the territories in the course of two wars of self-defence. That is true, but Israel has not yet undertaken to annex the territory. And it does respect the international law on the subject as a matter of grace, as the Israeli government has said and as its Supreme Court has ruled."

Rostow explained that the West Bank and Gaza (even in the absence of a prior legal sovereign) remain unallocated areas of the Palestine Mandate, whose status is yet to be determined in direct bilateral negotiations according to UN Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338. (Areas in "A" under the Oslo Accords have been determined to be "Palestinian," and remain the sole exception.) Hence the bulk of the territories are indeed disputed but also – since under Israeli military control – "occupied." On May 26, Sharon openly acknowledged this fact. Yet all hell broke loose.

The reason is that although "occupation" is a legally neutral term, it has long been used by the Arabs to delegitimatize Israel. The Arabs allow for no distinction between territory acquired in a war of self-defence (as in the American occupation of Germany and Japan after World War II) and territory acquired in a war of aggression (Nazi Germany in Europe, Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein in Kuwait).

One way to avoid such negative connotations in Israel's case is to shun the word "occupation" or put it in ironic quotes. But strictly speaking, the term is neutral, although Rostow was naively wrong to assume that it had "no implication of 'vileness.'"

Unfortunately, all too often where Jews and Israel are concerned, efforts to imply vileness are rarely far from the surface. Sharon, in an act of surprising candour, was quickly reminded of this unfortunate reality.

Claims head asks ex-slave labourers to be patient

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

The head of the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany pleaded with Holocaust survivors to be patient if they have been rejected or not received an answer to their application to the German and Swiss slave-labour funds.

Gideon Taylor, executive vice-president of the New York-based organization, said his staff is "working round the clock" to process claims as quickly as possible. There are about 6,500 survivors in Canada whose applications were rejected or are pending, he told an overflow audience at a public event organized by the Survivor Assistance Office of the Cummings Jewish Centre for Seniors.

The conference received almost 270,000 applications for the funds from survivors worldwide, he said. Since June 2001, more than 119,000 Jews who performed slave or forced labour, living in 53 countries today, have been compensated in the amount of $586.5 million (all figures US) from the German Foundation, a program of the government and industry. Additionally, some 127,000 have been paid $183 million from the Swiss fund, a settlement reached with banks.

The second (final) payment will be made when the conference has processed all claims. "That will be a matter of months," Taylor said.

The order in which claims were processed was based on the likelihood that they would be approved, he said.

He described the slave-labour program as the most complex ever administered by the conference. The conference, he stressed, does not control a sum of money, but rather tries to back up the claims of applicants by finding the documentation the Germans require. (The Swiss automatically accept claims approved by Germany).

This has involved hiring more than 100 researchers to comb through archives in Yad Vashem, the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum and about 25 other locations around the world, in addition to the conference's own files.

"If your name does not come up, it does not mean you are not eligible. We sent a letter for more information to many people, which you should have by now… We are asking that you send us as much description [of your wartime experience] as you can. Hopefully, we will be able to submit this to the Germans and they will approve it."

For those who have received rejection letters, there is still hope. The reason may be a "technical question," such as a conflict between information submitted and what was found in the archives. "Or we may be wrong. With the huge volumes of claims, mistakes are possible," said Taylor, adding that the conference is negotiating with the Germans to accept claims in "the broadest and most liberal way."

If the rejection is confirmed, an appeals authority was recently created. It is based in Jerusalem and independent of the conference, he said.

As for applicants who have received neither a letter for more information or one of rejection, Taylor said, "It means your case is pending. We are looking in the archives as hard as we can. If we can't find what we need, we will send a 'request for information' letter."

Taylor said the first priority is to process the claims of survivors; claims from their heirs are secondary for now.

Payments from the German Foundation are to be made in two instalments, with the final amount to be determined by the total number of eligible applicants.

The maximum amount allowed under the German legislation is approximately $7,500 for former slave labourers and $2,500 for former forced labourers.

Taylor said the conference did not want to administer the slave-labour funds at first, but Germany insisted that it do so, or there would be no settlement.

This was Taylor's first visit to Montreal since joining the conference in January 1999. Dublin-born and Oxford-educated, Taylor said he had had little association with Holocaust survivors until he came to New York to work for the Joint Distribution Committee.

"It has been a privilege and an honour to do what I can, no matter how inadequate. We do our best, we fight as hard as we can, even after agreements are reached. We know your frustrations. We try to listen to survivors and take back the messages we hear from you," Taylor said.

When negotiations on slave-labour compensation began, "the first German demand" was that whatever the agreement, the Jewish community would accept it as "closure," Taylor said.

"We said in principle we [could] not continue if that was part of the agreement. With the German government, as the successor of the Reich, there could not ever, ever be closure. This is not only a financial, but a moral issue… We will never give up that struggle."

The Germans backed down and put it in writing, he said. "We have gone back twice since the German Foundation agreement and added about 7,000-8,000 people [who were previously ineligible]."

In the question period, Issie Veisfeld, who said he performed slave labour in Romania, bitterly criticized the conference for not helping him. "We were told there is no such thing as slave labour in Romania… and that we can't hire a lawyer anymore and sue Germany ourselves." Taylor replied that the conference tried to negotiate with Germany the broadest inclusion for the fund. "It does not mean we don't think there was no slave labour. It means we are fighting with the Germans to [relax] those strict, technical rules."

Some Romanian Jews did receive payment, but Germany later "blocked additional cases. It's not a case that we pay some and not others."

He suggested Veisfeld write the German government.

IMPORTANT NOTICE FOR EMPLOYERS AND EMPLOYEES AFFECTED BY SARS

Is your business facing difficulties because of SARS?
The Government of Canada's Work Sharing Program may help you.

What is the Work Sharing Program?
This program enables businesses to avoid layoffs by shortening the work week and paying reduced wages accordingly. Eligible workers draw benefits from Employment Insurance (EI) to compensate for the lower wages.

Who can participate?
Permanent full- or part-time employees eligible to receive regular EI benefits.

How can employers qualify?
Employers must have been in business in Canada for at least 2 years and demonstrate that the need for reduced hours is temporary, unavoidable and not seasonal.

Other measures for employees
If you are EI-eligible and have been quarantined you can collect EI benefits immediately without a medical certificate. If you work in a health care setting, had to miss work but are not EI-eligible, you could receive special assistance.

We also have programs and services to help those who have lost their job.

Rights tribunal slams anti-Semitic Web site

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A human rights tribunal has ordered an Alberta man to stop using the Internet to disseminate anti-Semitic propaganda that included calls for the extermination of the Jewish people.

A tribunal of the Canadian Human Rights Commission (CHRC) ruled that a Web site operated by Coleman, Alta., resident Fred Kyburz fostered hatred against the Jewish people and should be removed from the Internet.

"When read in context, the messages on the Patriots on Guard Web site tell the reader that Jewish people are innately devious, treacherous and murderous. Not only do they want to kidnap, corrupt and kill 'white children,' their ultimate goal is to take over the world," the tribunal said in its ruling.

The tribunal also found that messages on the Web site included articles "that openly advocate the extermination of the Jewish people."

The tribunal ordered Kyburz, who did not contest the case, to remove the anti-Semitic materials and pay $30,000 to Richard Warman, an Ottawa lawyer who initiated the complaint against him.

A further $7,500, payable to the government of Canada, was imposed as a penalty "to reflect society's opprobrium for [Kyburz's] conduct." Failure to comply with the judgement could lead to contempt charges. Even before the judgement was released, Warman successfully lobbied the site's U.S.-based Internet host to remove Kyburz's Web site. Kyburz, however, continues to sponsor a Web forum on Yahoo.

Warman, who is not Jewish, saw the decision as "a vindication of two years worth of consistent vilification, as all of the evil Kyburz felt Jewish people were involved in were personified and embodied in his attacks on me."

Karen Mock, executive-director of the Canadian Race Relations Foundation, said the decision reinforces a similar ruling in the case involving Holocaust-denier Ernst Zundel and hate material posted on his Web site. In that landmark decision, the CHRC exerted its jurisdiction over the Internet and issued a cease and desist order against Zundel.

In its decision, the tribunal noted that Kyburz retaliated against Warman for complaining about the Web site – something prohibited by the Canadian Human Rights Act. Not only did Kyburz call on Warman's former employer, the Chief Justice of the Federal Court of Canada, to fire him, he threatened Warman's life.

Warman said the threats "made me quite concerned about my personal safety," leading him to change his daily routines. Warman said he believes Kyburz "kind of transferred his hatred of the Jewish people to spewing hate material at [me] as a representative of the Jewish faith."

Some of the postings on his site revealed Kyburz's affinity for conspiracy theories. In one, Kyburz refers to Warman's "evil" efforts to shut down the site and said: "The fact is, we better learn before they are poisoning us with their proposed vaccinations and other medical poisons."

Warman said Kyburz appears to sympathize with a small anti-tax group that believes government taxes are illegal.

"Get out and get active in the community. Do a little volunteering. Try to make friends so you have someone to go out with. I keep myself very active, that's my nature. Have the whole family for dinner every two or three months. I do 'cook and carry' – cook a nice meal and go to somebody's house. Then, a couple of weeks later, I go to somebody else. Get very active in your life; don't sit home."

-- Alice Shapiro

"Exercise, weightlifting … I'm a volunteer at Branson, I do Meals on Wheels and work for lawyers doing title searches."

– Ernest Steinberg

"Get off your rear end, get out of the house, get away from the TV. Meet people, go to seniors' centres … take part in activities … and be happy!"

-- Marion Greenberg

"I just moved to this area, I wanted to live close to my children. My 5-year-old great-granddaughter said, 'you may be an old man, Poppa, but you're alive!"

– Jack Belfer

"Eat a good breakfast – porridge, toast, grapefruit – so you're satisfied and ready to go anywhere. With a good breakfast, you can face anything."

– Annie Fishman

"I have to recharge myself in the morning if I have someplace to go ... but I know I'll be interested if I have someplace to go."

– Pearl Berger

How will you recharge yourself?

Toronto broadcast journalist kicks smoking habit with Positive Changes

"Quitting was easy and effortless"

– Christina Cherneskey, CFRB

I used to smoke half a pack a day – one pack on a stressful day or an evening out. I smoked since the age of 14, that's over 25 years... ridiculous.

I tried cold turkey many times... it lasted less than 2 weeks. I tried the patch and the gum. Nothing worked. I almost started with the Zyban pills, but [I thought] why pump my body with more chemicals in addition to the nicotine? I was in this morass or canyon until I got an e-mail from a coworker who told me about Positive Changes.

I can't remember exactly when I stopped smoking because it's not an issue anymore. I stopped after the first session, but then I had a few lapses ... I let the stress win. But then when I was reminded to forget to smoke in the hypnosis sessions, then I stopped permanently. I didn't feel that I needed to buy them, to have them around; it just fell into place naturally for me.

"Why pump my body with more chemicals?"

I've noticed lots of benefits since I quit smoking. Firstly, I don't stink – for me that was a big improvement.

After winter and the weather changed, I felt immediately like walking. I felt energized. I have an appetite and I can taste my food. I'm dealing with stress differently now. Things [that used to stress me out] just aren't that big an issue anymore. Another benefit is that with the medical history in my family with heart and high blood pressure, I'm not adding to it. Imagine this – while I quit smoking I actually lost weight!

Christina Cherneskey can be heard on Saturday and Sunday from 11 am – 3 pm on NEWSTALK 1010

If you would have asked me as a smoker if I were in control the answer would have been "Back off baby, of course I am". But with hindsight, I was not in control. I would run down an escalator or two flights of stairs in the winter to have a cigarette in minus 40 weather. I would leave home and drive to buy a pack of cigarettes because I had forgotten to buy them. That's not control, not even close.

In my business you've got to have an opinion, and stick to it. This Positive Changes program has been amazing. I've gained much more than being smoke-free. Since the program, now what I research I retain. Before I used to always come into the studio with stacks and stacks of notes when I was doing my live talk radio show; now I only do it a little bit. I'm tapping into parts of my brain that I've never met yet. The hypnosis itself and power of suggestion has been an amazing experience.

I'm recommending Positive Changes to friends already. I'm confident that I will never smoke again because it's different this time. Quitting was easy and effortless. I feel like I don't need to go back to it. I know that it's not ever going to come back and take control of me.

"While I quit smoking I actually lost weight"

Hypnosis is really a neat process and is so relaxing. Now that I've tried it, why not try it yourself?

LOSE WEIGHT TOO! THE POSITIVE CHANGES YOU MAKE ARE UP TO YOU!

Physician stops snacking!

"I lost 5 lbs. in the first week. The weight loss has been steady. I stopped snacking after dinner.... I couldn't control my eating habits, even though, as a physician, I knew how it would affect my health. Now, with hypnosis, I feel much more in control."

– Brownen Gates, Anesthetist, Sunnybrook Hospital

Loses 48 lbs. in 6 months!

"I cannot believe how easy this program is to follow. This is not a "diet", but a change to healthy eating habits. There are no calories or points to count. I reduced my starch intake significantly. I have lost 48 lbs. in 6 months and feel on top of the world."

– Anne Smith, Human Resources Assistant, Thornhill

Jewish war vets honoured

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The Jewish community's past and future came together at a gala dinner honouring the Ottawa Jewish War Veterans.

The event, held May 29 at Agudath Israel Synagogue, was a major fundraiser for Hillel Academy, the city's largest Jewish day school.

The pairing of the students and vets was most appropriate, Rabbi Reuven Bulka of Congregation Machzikei Hadas said in his opening address.

"The war vets made the future of our community possible, [while] Hillel Academy is dedicated to educating our children to continue our community," he said.

Indeed, explained event co-chair Benita Baker, the Ottawa Post of the Jewish War Veterans of Canada was anxious to reinforce its ties with the community and to pass on its members' message to youth.

The members call their mission "mi'dor l'dor" (meaning "from generation to generation"), and Baker said they were pleased to join forces for what would otherwise have been their own annual dinner.

During the cocktail hour preceding the dinner, guests were able to browse through an exhibit of photographs, uniforms and assorted military memorabilia provided by the Ottawa Jewish War Veterans, many of whom were in attendance with family and friends.

Reading from Pagtakhan's message, she challenged the vets to share their stories and challenged students to encourage them to do so. And she urged "the rest of us… [to] never cease to express our gratitude to those who fought for a lasting peace."

Israel's ambassador to Canada, Haim Divon, said the evening was about "saluting our heroes… The percentage of [Canadian] Jewish war veterans was the highest number representing one ethnic group," Divon said.

"Some of them helped [Israel] during the War of Independence and we shall never ever forget that, dear friends."

Following a commemoration ceremony for fallen comrades by Rabbi Arnold Fine, the mood turned cheerfully nostalgic as jazz singer Deborah Davis and her band, Segue-Way to Jazz took the audience on a sentimental journey with a selection of songs from World War I, World War II and Israel's Six Day War.

They were also joined by Cantor Daniel Benlolo of Congregation Beth Shalom West and accompanist Aviva Lightstone for several Israeli songs.

For the final number, Ottawa Post Commander Paul Bender, who helped the band research the war songs, led the band and audience in a moving rendition of Now is the Hour When We Must Say Goodbye.

A MAJOR MEDICAL BREAKTHROUGH IN FAT REDUCTION, NOW IN TORONTO!

The Non-Surgical Alternative to Liposuction

Infusion Lipolysis™ is a new medical procedure which shrinks fat cells. Developed by Toronto cosmetic surgeon Dr. Stan Gore, it is available only from LIPIDOCTOR™ Medical Slimming Clinics. In contrast to liposuction, which removes cells surgically, the physician infuses medications directly into fatty tissue, breaking down and burning stored fat. Cells shrink as excess fat disappears.

Dr. Gore states that the procedure is safe, comfortable and affordable. "Our Spot-Slimming and Cellulite Defence Programs involve only one injection for each problem area, followed by daily, home applications of transdermal creams, custom-compounded with prescription medications. They are individually personalized for age, gender, lifestage and metabolism. Compared to surgical liposuction, Infusion Lipolysis is more gentle, less dramatic, less traumatic and a fraction of the cost!"

Most patients rapidly achieve visible, measurable improvement in contour, texture and tone. Unlike surgical liposuction, Infusion Lipolysis™ uniquely allows patients to maintain results indefinitely. "Continue our daily, one minute, home maintenance program to discourage future fat and cellulite accumulation in treated areas."

LIPIDOCTOR™ Medical Slimming Clinics also offer a unique program to optimize everyday workouts while spot-reducing fat. Their objective is improved muscle definition in problem areas in only two to four weeks. The combined prescription and natural products in their Workout Program not only diminish fat, but also enhance muscle tone, power and endurance. "Casual exercisers, fitness enthusiasts and competitive athletes all love it because it's so easy. Following your clinical procedure, simply apply maintenance Workout Cream daily, before a sports or exercise activity."

When asked what differentiates his therapy from over-the-counter remedies, Dr. Gore responds: "Infusion Lipolysis™ is a state-of-the-art clinical procedure, carried out in an established medical facility, followed by transdermal Rx meds. No pain; no bruising. You now really can lose fat thickness. And we will prove it to you during your no obligation, medical consultation."

In fact, Dr. Gore routinely does just that. He measures each patient's belly fat thickness with skin fold calipers, applies a test dose of one or more LIPIDOCTOR™ clinical creams and re-measures thirty minutes later.

The results are remarkable! This test also helps the doctor predict how much more fat can be lost with a complete Infusion Lipolysis™ program.

Here's the story behind Dr. Gore's discovery. "I always had problem areas of fat. I underwent two disappointing liposuction procedures in my 40's. They weren't the easy fix I had hoped for. Results were not permanent; I still had to exercise regularly and count calories. In the right hands, liposuction is effective surgery, particularly when major changes in body contour are required. But for smaller problem areas, flabby tummies and cellulite in particular, shouldn't there be a simpler, less invasive, less inconvenient, less expensive solution? Plus a way to maintain results longterm without lifestyle disruption & deprivation?"

It appears that now there is!

Hamas reiterates opposition to ceasefire talks

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Hamas repeated its opposition to ceasefire talks with Palestinian Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas on Monday, dealing a new blow to his hopes of persuading it to halt attacks against Israelis.

Abbas made a new appeal for dialogue on Monday after Hamas pulled out of ceasefire talks last Friday, accusing him of being too conciliatory to Israel at a peace summit last week in Jordan's Red Sea port of Aqaba.

Hamas leaders met in Gaza to discuss Abbas' appeal. But Ismail Abu Shanab, a senior Hamas official, said: "He has not changed his attitude from Aqaba. Therefore the situation is unchanged regarding dialogue with [Abbas]."

Another Hamas official, Abdel-Aziz Rantissi, said: "We stopped dialogue based on some developments and now there are new developments that need to be studied... Our position now remains as it was until we study them."

Earlier Monday, Abbas denounced new attacks by extremist groups that threaten the U.S.-backed "road map" peace plan and vowed to press on with efforts to persuade them to agree a ceasefire, declaring that for the Palestinians there is no alternative to dialogue.

Abbas said he will not use force against extremist groups under any circumstances, despite their stated determination to derail the road map with attacks on Israelis, including two Sunday shootings in which five Israeli soldiers were killed and troops shot dead five Palestinian gunmen.

Abbas says he won't use force to restrain extremists

"The position of the government is to denounce both attacks," Abbas told reporters Sunday in Ramallah. Condemning such attacks, he added: "We reject these acts, and if they continue they will complicate the situation and make the peace process difficult."

Apparently responding to reports of a rift with PA President Yasser Arafat, Abbas said he had co-ordinated every move with Arafat, confined by Israel to his Ramallah headquarters.

Referring to his efforts to persuade extremists to halt attacks against Israelis, he said: "For us there is no alternative to dialogue," but, he added, "We will not force anyone to resume dialogue."

Israel has demanded that Abbas crack down on extremist groups and disarm them, but Abbas has preferred negotiations in order to avoid a civil war among the Palestinians.

Abbas also responded to some of the criticisms voiced by Palestinians since the summit. He appealed for Israel to release Palestinian prisoners and to ease the suffering caused by closures of West Bank towns and villages.

He also condemned a security fence which Israel is building to seal off the West Bank. Israel says the fence offers it protection from suicide bombers, but the Palestinians say it constitutes a de facto border and grabs Palestinian land.

"We demand that [U.S.] President [George W.] Bush... [alleviate] the suffering of our people, starting with the prisoners, stop closures, end house demolitions, remove the shameful wall and dismantle settlement outposts," Abbas said.

Some parties have been trying to escalate the situation since the new Palestinian government was established, Abbas said, adding that such moves would have no effect on his decisions.

On the topic of a Palestinian "right of return," Abbas said: "We will not be able to accept the Israeli reservation" on the issue.

Terror groups unite in effort to shred road map

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — New violence has threatened the diplomatic progress made at two Middle East summits last week, posing a challenge to the U.S.-backed "road map" for peace.

At least five Israelis were killed and five wounded in separate attacks in Gaza and West Bank on Sunday.

They came after Israel reimposed a total closure on the West Bank, citing a high number of warnings of terror attacks, Israeli Army Radio reported

U.S. officials urged Israel and the Palestinians not to let extremists set the diplomatic agenda, but the weekend's events showed the difficulties in following up on the steps taken at the summits in Egypt and Jordan.

In Gaza, four soldiers were killed and four others wounded when three gunmen dressed in Israeli army uniforms infiltrated an army position near the Erez crossing. The gunmen were killed in the ensuing exchange of fire.

The three had apparently slipped into a line of Palestinian workers entering the Erez industrial zone and crossed a fence and wall separating the industrial zone from the nearby army position.

After reaching the entrance to the outpost, they opened fire and threw grenades at a soldier outside, killing him. They then shot and killed two soldiers on guard duty. The gunmen then entered and opened fire, killing one soldier and wounding four.

Soldiers returned fire, killing the three. Duct tape and plastic handcuffs were found on their bodies, suggesting they had intended to kidnap soldiers as bargaining chips for the release of Palestinian security prisoners.

In other violence Sunday, an Israeli was killed when two gunmen opened fire near the Tomb of the Patriarchs in Hebron.

In a rare move, three extremist Palestinian groups – Hamas, Islamic Jihad and the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigades, which is linked to the ruling Fatah faction of Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat – issued a joint statement claiming responsibility for the Gaza attack. A leaflet gave the names of the gunmen, all in their early 20s, one from each group.

"This joint operation was committed to confirm our people's united choice of holy war and resistance until the end of occupation over our land and holy places," the leaflet said.

It also said the gunmen left from the Gaza city of Beit Hanoun, currently under IDF control.

The shooting was the first such attack since U.S. President George W. Bush met Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and PA Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas last Wednesday in Aqaba to push forward the road map peace plan.

The involvement of the Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigades was seen as a direct challenge to Abbas, a senior Fatah member who has been trying to persuade extremists to halt attacks on Israelis and who angered some with his conciliatory remarks at the Aqaba summit. Accusing Abbas of conceding on Palestinian demands, Hamas froze ceasefire contacts with the PA and renewed its vow to carry out suicide attacks against Israelis.

Abbas said in Ramallah that dialogue is the only way to achieve Palestinian interests. He also called on Palestinian opposition groups to renew contacts with the PA.

Israel, meanwhile, called on the Palestinians to take immediate steps to crack down on terror. Deputy Defence Minister Ze'ev Boim said the attacks prove Palestinian terror groups are "not yet ready to accept" the road map, drawn up by the "quartet" of the United States, European Union, United Nations and Russia.

Cabinet minister Effi Eitam called on the government to cease contacts with the PA until it takes steps to fight terror.

After the attacks, Secretary of State Colin Powell said such actions by opponents of peace were expected, and the United States remains committed to the road map.

"This is the time when both leaders have to do everything they can" to move forward, Powell told Fox News Sunday. He added Sharon is expected to meet his commitments and remove illegal settlements.

Sharon was on the defensive Sunday night, facing criticism from a Likud convention in Jerusalem for adopting the road map.

In remarks interrupted by boos, Sharon said the Israeli public supports him and that Israel would not yield on its rejection of the "right of return" for Palestinian refugees or other reservations to the road map the government had when it endorsed it.

How terrorists entered Israel

By AMOS HAREL and RONI SINGER
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEV AVIV — The terrorists who carried out the suicide bombing at Mike's Place in Tel Aviv on April 29 crossed from Gaza into Israel with the aid of an Italian journalist, according to details of the investigation revealed Monday following the lifting of a court-imposed gag order.

The bombing, which killed three people, was carried out by a British citizen of Pakistani origin, Asif Mohammed Hanif.

His accomplice, Omar Khan Sharif, also a British national of Pakistani origin, fled when his explosive device failed to detonate. His body was found two weeks later in the sea off the Tel Aviv coast. It is not known whether his death was caused by an accident or exhaustion or whether he drowned himself deliberately.

According to the details released for publication by the Tel Aviv District Court, Hanif and Sharif were recruited by the militant Hamas organization in Damascus, where they had studied before coming to Israel.

The two travelled to Israel via Jordan, crossing the Allenby Bridge on April 12, and then proceeded to travel throughout the country, as well as the West Bank and Gaza, without hindrance. In Gaza, they finalized plans for the attack with Hamas leaders and posed as left-wing activists, attending events sponsored by the International Solidarity Movement.

The biggest problem they faced was how to cross from Gaza back into Israel once they were ready to carry out the attack. They solved this problem with the aid of an Italian journalist, who offered them a ride through the checkpoint in her car together with some other Italian journalists.

At the time, foreign journalists were allowed to pass through checkpoints virtually without inspection, so this assistance enabled the two to slip through undiscovered. It is because of this incident that Israel has since tightened the rules for foreign journalists and now insists on subjecting them to checkpoint inspections.

The Italian journalist was interrogated by the police and the Shin Bet security service, but apparently had no idea that the two men were terrorists. She has since left the country. The activists with whom Sharif and Hanif spent time in Gaza have also been interrogated, and some have been deported. But they also appear to have been unaware that the two were terrorists.

Contrary to the security services' initial assessment, Hanif and Sharif apparently did not bring their bombs with them when they came from Jordan. Shortly after the attack, Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz announced the explosives had been hidden in a Qu'ran and smuggled through the Allenby Bridge crossing.

But after further investigation, the security services have concluded that the two probably obtained the bombs in Gaza. The scanners at the Allenby Bridge are highly sophisticated and would almost certainly have detected any explosives; it would have been much easier to get a bomb past the less sophisticated scanners at the Erez checkpoint from Gaza into Israel.

Another initial assessment that further investigation seems to have refuted is that the attack was aided by an international terrorist organization, such as Hezbollah or even Al Qaeda.

Security services have been unable to prove any international involvement, but the unofficial conclusion is that the bombing was apparently a homegrown production by Hamas in Gaza. The mastermind was probably Mohammed Def, who heads Hamas's military wing there.

Hanif and Sharif spent most of their time in Tel Aviv at a small hostel called Hayarkon 48 on Hayarkon Street. According to the proprietors, it may be there that they thought of making Mike's Place their target: during several days of their stay, a large poster prominently displayed on the lobby bulletin board invited hotel guests to musical evenings at the nearby pub.

The hotel's owner, Omri Gur-Lavie, said the two never aroused any suspicions among the staff.

"After all, they presented British passports and spoke perfect English," he said. "There was not a hint of Arabic, other than their names."

But en route to the attack, Sharif discovered a problem with his explosive belt and decided to turn back, leaving Hanif to carry out the bombing alone.

Clown's magic works 'miracles' in Israeli hospitals

Friends and community members helped pay for the props Strong used on his three-week trip, which took him to 11 hospitals and seven schools and day cares across the country.

"I was busy from the day I got there," he said. "It was very rewarding."

Strong said he wanted to bring his clown act to Israel in the spirit of tzedakah.

"My idea was to go to poor areas where kids don't necessarily get a chance to see entertainers," Strong said.

"To see smiles on people's faces – that's my aim."

Although Strong had pre-arranged some visits, many were impromptu, which added to what he called the "miraculous" nature of the trip.

For instance, Strong was slated to visit the Alyn Hospital located on a nearby mountain range in Kiryat Yovel a day after an unlikely snowstorm hit Jerusalem this February, but the storm had shut down the city's transportation system.

"The lady at the hospital told me I wouldn't even be able to get a cab," Strong said.

But United Jewish Appeal workers sent a jeep to fetch Strong, and his show at the hospital was a hit.

"They were so happy that I came because there was nobody else at the hospital to do programs for kids because of [the storm]."

Strong visited Israelis of all backgrounds, including Arab and Druze children in Nahariya, orphaned Ethiopians and kindergarten students in the West Bank.

He said the reception he received was terrific.

"When you're [in Israel], everyone seems to be your family," Strong said.

Using clowns in hospitals is becoming increasingly popular in the country, he said.

"It's a tremendous form of therapy for everybody. It's amazing how is transforms a whole ward, or a whole hospital."

Strong hopes other entertainers will follow in his footsteps and go to the Jewish state to help people forget the Middle East conflict and laugh a little.

"If [my experience] encourages other people, that's the whole idea," Strong said. "It makes such a difference. You can't imagine."

Strong plans to bring several other entertainers with him when he returns to Israel next year.

In his Toronto shows, Bonkers uses comedy, music and magic and also dresses up as different characters, including Batman and Spiderman.

Strong was born in London, England, and came to Canada in 1971. He began clowning as as a hobby, but stopped working as a footwear salesman several years ago and took up clowning full time.

Israeli company develops SARS detection kit

in Israel and found it was identifying the virus in its incubation stage with high accuracy. We sent the information to contacts in Singapore whom we have close relations with. They invited us last month to come for a presentation and to conduct some tests."

Medex Screen, founded in March 1999 under the auspices of the Industry and Trade Ministry's technology incubator program, has worked for several years developing the Medex Test device. The device can provide a diagnosis in eight to 10 minutes and is capable of identifying the virus in its incubation stage, long before other symptoms (like temperature) indicate its presence.

Founded by Dr. Alex Kanevsky, the company moved to Dimona in 2000 and currently employs seven workers. Medex Screen recently signed an agreement with a chain of clinics in the Philippines, in conjunction with local insurance companies, to establish centres for diagnosing an immune system illness, using the company's product.

The Philippine company has committed to sales of $1-2 million (US) and Medex Screen anticipates earning net profits of about $300,000 from the partnership during its first year.

Produced in Israel, unit cost of the device is expected to be about $2,500 (US).

"When we reach the stage of mass production, we'll transfer production to Southeast Asia," Hirshman said.

"SARS changed our business plan to a certain extent. Until the clinical testing related to SARS is completed, we're focusing on the original uses and marketing planned for the device." he added.

Medex Screen's business model includes regular royalties as well an ASP (application service provider) model. Under the ASP model, the company sells the device, but all test results must be sent back to Medex Screen for diagnosis.

When American artist and graphic designer David Small decided to use plastic paper for his interactive book, he imagined the medium would be great for cleaning up fingerprints and dirt. He never thought it would be wiped down for microbes.

Small's Illuminated Manuscript, on display at the Real Time Gallery this month, is a 26-page book that is meant to be touched. The text is beamed down from a projector mounted to the ceiling and visitors can manipulate the words by touching the plastic pages.

Small, who was in Toronto recently for the exhibit's Canadian opening, says that a month ago, when the Severe Acute Respiratory Syndrome (SARS) scare in Toronto was at its height, he would have been worried about more than just dirt stains on his book. But now that the alarm has settled somewhat, he's more relaxed.

"Relatively speaking, it's a safe piece of artwork. It's on the same level as a doorknob," he says.

To ease fears, Small says the book is cleaned frequently to remove both microbes and fingerprints.

The book is mounted on a platform and housed in a spartan room with concrete floors. Hidden beneath the platform is a computer that controls the projector. The projector reads the sensors embedded in the book's pages and transmits that information to the computer. It is the computer program, written by Small, that allows the viewers to manipulate the text by touch.

Small initially intended The Illuminated Manuscript to be an alphabet book, but Sept. 11 changed that.

"After Sept. 11, it seemed too trivial to me to have a book that wasn't about something," he says.

Inspired by an article that his grandfather had written in 1941 about World War II and then-U.S. president Franklin Roosevelt's famous Four Freedoms speech, Small changed the theme of his project to make a political statement on freedom.

"That was a big inspiration to me, to see something my grandfather had written when he was in his 20s, and to me, a lot of what he was talking about felt very relevant in 2001," says Small.

In a masterful piece of juxtaposition, Small has pitted fiery speeches by political figures of FDR, U.S. President George W. Bush and Al-Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden crusading for freedom against the chilling testimony of his great-aunt describing the cattle car ride to Auschwitz.

"I had all these writings about these lofty ideals of freedom and then here was somebody talking about the absolute loss of freedom," Small says. "All of the political and intellectual ideas come at it from a very intellectual point of view, not a personal point of view, and this was a very personal story."

The name itself has significance. Illuminated manuscripts hearken back to medieval times, when monks would copy texts and emboss them with designs. In this cave-like room with concrete floors, The Illuminated Manuscript is the only thing that emits light – a symbol, as Small suggests, of the wisdom within it.

Small first created The Illuminated Manuscript in 2002 for Documenta 11, a politically charged artists' exhibition in Kassel, Germany. When he arrived at the exhibit, Small saw that many of the works were much more political than his, and many were anti-American.

"It made me want to go in the other direction and do something very pro-American… I never even really thought about having such an American identity," he says.

Small, 37, grew up in a secular Jewish home in Connecticut, where his parents ran a company that sold microscopes. He says the most Jewish thing he did as a child was learn the prayer for lighting Chanukah candles. He still remembers it.

In 1999, Small graduated from MIT with a PhD in media studies. His thesis, Rethinking the Book, was about new technology in the information age.

Since graduate school, Small has focused on the differences between presenting information traditionally, with paper and ink, and digitally, with new media and technology.

"Once you have words that can move and be in three dimensions and be animated across the screen in response to your actions, how is that going to change the way we think about writing?" he says. "It doesn't make sense that we will start changing the medium of the text from print to new digital form without changing the underlying text itself."

Despite his artistic successes, Small defines himself firstly as a graphic designer. He has begun many of his works more because of his fascination with typography rather than an artistic idea, he says.

"I feel more comfortable talking about the technological side than I do about the rest," he says.

Some of his earlier work includes the Talmud Project, which was the prototype for The Illuminated Manuscript and combined sections of the Torah and Talmud with writings by a contemporary French philosopher; the Human Genome, a display for the genetics exhibit of the Museum of Science and Industry; and four interactive displays for the Museum of Sex. Small also runs his own graphic design company, called Small Design Firm.

The Illuminated Manuscript is on display until June 28 at the Real Time Gallery, 55 Mill St., Toronto, 416-364-1177.

Monsieur Batignole and The Burial Society

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

Two new Jewish films have recently arrived at video stores. Each of these films played in theatres for a very short time and then disappeared until their recent re-emergence on video.

Monsieur Batignole is a charming French film that appeared at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival recently. It is set in Paris during the Nazi occupation of France.

Batignole's future son-in-law is living with the family and is an aspiring writer who refuses to accept the fact that he has no talent. He is also a small time collaborator for the Nazis and informs them that a Jewish family is living in an apartment above the butcher store. The Jewish family is arrested and deported, but the youngest son Simon manages to escape and returns to his family's apartment to find it occupied by the Batignoles.

M. Batignole takes pity on the boy. Batignole hides and feeds the boy and eventually arranges for Simon and Simon's two cousins to escape to Switzerland, even escorting them across the border himself.

Monsieur Batignole is a tender heart-warming story that will touch everyone who sees it and now everyone will have

Celebrating Vincent Van Gogh's 150th anniversary

By NANCY WIGSTON
Special to The CJN

AMSTERDAM — Vincent Van Gogh sold only a single painting in his short but productive lifetime, yet he has become one of the best-selling artists on the planet, his work routinely fetching millions of dollars.

This year marks the 150th anniversary of Van Gogh's birth in 1853, and Dutch museums have naturally seized the chance to celebrate. To understand the man behind the sunflowers, Holland has launched two special exhibits, one in town and the other in the country.

Detail from Self-portrait as an Artist, 1888. Van Gogh Museum, Amsterdam [Vincent Van Gogh Foundation]

Van Gogh lovers can visit the eponymous museum in Amsterdam, then take a special bus directly to the countryside park at Otterio, where the single largest private collection of the artist's work was amassed by one of his early admirers.

Visitors line up early at the modern building in Amsterdam that houses the world's largest collection of Van Goghs. A special show in honour of his 150th – the museum's "gift" to Vincent – is called "Vincent's Choice." It's an original concept, the idea being to present the kinds of paintings and prints that Van Gogh grew up with and grew to love. His own works hang beside them, so we see before us the intimate interaction between the artist and the works that inspired him.

The exhibit moves like biography through the life of the great painter; we see the Dutch masters (he considered Rembrandt the ultimate among them), the prints his art-dealing uncles made available to the family and the works that Van Gogh admired, the simple rural themes in paintings by less famous artists, such as Brion and Daubigny, and his teacher in The Hague, Anton Mauve.

His many copies – what he called "interpretations" – of Jean-Francois Millet are also on view. It's gripping to see the two painters' work hung side by side.

Another passion of Van Gogh's was the Japanese woodcut. Working with his art dealer brother Theo in Paris, he helped collect 550 sheets of woodcuts by Japanese masters. One result was his incomparable Small Pear Tree in Blossom; another was his move to Arles, in Provence, where he sought not only light but also Japanese motifs. Van Gogh's own collection of Japanese woodcut prints are also on display.

This is a highly personalized exhibit, bolstered by excerpts from the voluminous letters Van Gogh wrote to his brother, in which he made more than 1,000 references to specific painters and their works.

Just as Van Gogh's own life was rife with emotions, which were often unhappy, so he attracted others to his emotive painting style and tragic story, after his suicide at age 37 became public knowledge.

One of his fans was a woman named Helene Kroller-Muller, immensely wealthy but also less than happy in her domestic life. In middle age, Helene developed a passion for art and esthetics. She studied esthetic principles with the well-known teacher and art dealer H.P. Bremmer and spent many hours bent over his books on art. An early champion of Van Gogh, Bremmer had written a book about Holland's most famous tortured artist.

The Van Gogh tragedy gripped the romantic imagination of art lovers and collectors alike. At the family hunting lodge on a 5,000-hectare park in Otterio, 90 minutes from Amsterdam, Helene studied, collected and eventually planned and built a museum to house her collection, which included 87 paintings by Van Gogh alone.

Her books, even the table where she sat, form part of the Kroller-Muller Museum's engaging new show, on until Oct. 12, called "Vincent and Helene."

The relationship implied by the exhibit's title never existed in reality, but something about the painter who always signed his work "Vincent" intrigued Kroller-Muller. An assistant recalled the "joyous rapture" that greeted Bremmer when he arrived with two Van Goghs for her.

Kroller-Muller's collecting reached almost a fever pitch. During a single morning in Paris, in April 1912, she purchased seven Van Goghs. Bremmer acted as her middleman, buying the paintings from Van Gogh's sister-in-law Jo, the widow of his brother Theo, who also died young.

At Otterio, Kroller-Muller's purchases are displayed in the order in which she made them. The familiar Terrace of a Night Café is here, plus many less well-known pictures, including an unusual Sunflowers in which the massive flower heads droop with their own weight. Equally fascinating are the six fakes mistaken for real Van Goghs. Visitors will notice that the fake Van Goghs improved as the real Van Gogh's work grew in popularity. In a final bit of irony, even the forgers were inspired by their subject.

IF YOU GO: "Vincent's Choice" is running at the Van Gogh Museum until June 15; "Van Gogh Modern" explores his influence on modern artists, from June 27 to Oct. 12. Paulus Potterstraat 7, 1070 AJ Amsterdam, info@van-goghmuseum.nl. Prices: adults, 9E; teenagers 13-17, 2.50E; children 0-12, free. Buses leave from the Van Gogh Museum to the Kroller-Muller Museum in Otterio for 10 Euros return. Museum entry costs 10E. Closed Mondays.

Set in the wildlife park where Kroller-Muller used to ride, the museum/park has many outdoor sculptures and hundreds of free white bikes for visitors' use. For schedules and information, visit www.kmm.nl or www.holland.com.

Book Launch: L'Dor Vador Publications of Ottawa has just produced The Magic Pot, a new children's book written by Sharon Abron Drache and illustrated by Ellen Schowalter. A book launch was held last week at the National Library and Archives in Ottawa, and another is scheduled for June 15, 2:30 to 4:30 p.m., in the party room off the lobby of 260 Heath St. W., Toronto.

Abron Drache, who will be reading from the book, describes it as "a timeless fable about seven-year-old Rifkeh who discovers that learning to give reaps astonishing rewards for herself and her poor sick Grandmother Malke." She describes L'Dor Vador as an Ottawa-based publishing company that will specialize in Jewish stories in Canadian settings. The launch is co-sponsored by Toronto bookseller Nicholas Hoare and the Writers Union of Canada.

Names in the News

• The smiling faces of Jennifer Podemski and her sisters Tamara and Sarah grace the cover of the latest issue of Say Magazine, devoted to the spirit of Aboriginal youth. Jennifer and Tamara have already proven themselves as actors, with Sarah now a serious contender at acting school; all have a mixed Jewish and aboriginal heritage.

• A 1916 painting by Austrian expressionist Egon Schiele is expected to fetch up to 7 million British pounds at a Sotheby's auction in London this month. Titled Krumauer Landschaft or Little Town on the River, the painting belonged to a prominent Jewish art patron in Vienna when the Nazis seized it in 1938. It was sold in 1953 to a Linz art gallery and displayed there until returned to its rightful heirs earlier this year.

Author's stories connected with a fierce subtlety

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

The Ability to Forget, a compelling new collection of short stories by Canadian expatriate writer Norman Levine, is a welcome addition to his much-praised oeuvre, which includes By A Frozen River, Canada Made Me and other celebrated collections going back several decades.

Levine's trademark first-person narration is usually as sparse as it is sparkling. These 15 quirky and quasi-autobiographical sketches present economical accounts of memorable encounters combined with a minimalistic flourish that transforms them into art.

The author frequently juxtaposes two encounters or experiences in a single tale, leaving the reader to infer the connection between them. With Levine, a fierce subtlety is often in play, the whole is usually more than the sum of its parts, and the meaning always emerges from between the lines.

The first story, My Karsh Picture, quickly wins us over and offers a taste of what's to come. In it, Levine recalls sitting after-hours for a portrait with an assistant of the legendary photographer in his Ottawa studio, just before leaving to join the war as a young air force pilot during WWII.

Filtered through the sweet prism of memory, the stories are often tinged with sadness and loss. Yet, as in My Wife Has Left Me and Gifts, they also betray an inescapable comic sensibility.

In Gifts, for example, Levine meets two strangers in a restaurant who offer to drive him from Ottawa to Toronto. They proclaim themselves as bank robbers but we think they're just joking until they enlist his help in distributing $20 bills in the front doors of houses in a town enroute.

A seeker of adventure, irony and thrilling character revelation, the author delights in such delicious little ambiguities and mysteries.

He also adheres religiously to the first-person experiential narrative technique. One senses that he would regard the third-person omniscient voice as a manipulation of the author-reader relationship.

Indeed, he dons such a disguise in The Man With the Notebook, using the third person to convey information that seems essentially about himself. Suddenly the prose seems cold, uninviting, distanced. The experiment didn't work.

In a few stories, Levine refers to his Jewish roots and his Jewish upbringing in Ottawa. But it's unclear whether he identifies his own personal sense of exile, which he conveys with such sensitivity, with that of the Jewish people, from whom he seems so detached.

In Continuity, the Levine persona meets a Hebrew professor along the Cornish coast, both having shown an interest in local Jewish cemeteries.

The professor tells him that Jewish travellers through the region in the 1700s would chalk Hebrew messages in frying pans at certain inns where Jews were welcome, to assure the next Jewish traveler that the pan's kashrut had been preserved.

Levine seems to be searching for similar links with the past, similar assurances that sympathetic others have also trod the lonely and peripatetic past he has chosen for himself.

Even though I regard Levine's earlier story Thin Ice as one of the best thematically Jewish stories written by a Canadian, I admit I've been disappointed by a few stories by him (such as Something Happened Here) from other previous collections.

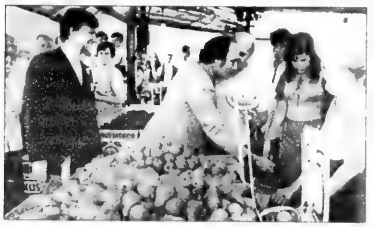
Perhaps the best tribute I can pay to this new collection, therefore, is that it prodded me to reread some of those earlier pieces and reappraise them in a more favourable light.

The Ability to Forget is published by Key Porter Books under the L&OD imprint and costs $21.95.

A nostalgic look at Kensington Market

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Currently the haunt of Asian, Portuguese and Caribbean immigrants, Toronto's Kensington area was once inextricably associated with Jews.



Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau pokes around the Kensington market in 1970.

The heyday of Kensington's identification with Jews was from the 1920s to the 1960s.

But even during this period, Kensington was inhabited by many other newcomers, ranging from Italians to Ukrainians.

Kensington, in particular, was known for its colourful outdoor market, which, for all intents and purposes, might have been pulled out of an atmospheric central European shtetl.

Now in the heart of Chinatown, Kensington is a paradigm of Canadian multiculturalism, an ethnic melting pot to which Torontonians and tourists alike gravitate. In 1970, Pierre Trudeau, Canada's prime minister, ventured into its depths.

Kensington's story is the subject of Kensington (Boston Mills Press), a nostalgic coffee table album with text by Jean Cochrane and photographs by Vincenzo Pietropaolo.

British colonial forces acquired the Kensington lands from three Mississauga Indian chiefs in 1787.

By the turn of the 19th century, it was no longer the preserve of middle-class Anglos but rather the home of newly arrived immigrants.

Many Jews from villages in eastern Europe and Russia congregated in and around Kensington. By 1913, Toronto's Jewish population was about 32,000.

Scratching out a living as peddlers, junk dealers, second-hand clothes merchants, shopkeepers and garment industry workers, Jews gradually made their way in this teeming neighbourhood.

They built shuls, such as the Kiever Synagogue, and a host of other institutions to serve the community.

And always, they shopped at the Kensington Market, with its crated chickens and live fish and wafting aromas of freshly baked bread and bagels.

Such was Kensington's convivial old-world atmosphere that CBC-TV used it as a backdrop for the popular and enduring sitcom The King of Kensington, starring Al Waxman and Fiona Reid.

Through sharp words and graphic black-and-white photos, Kensington brings to life a beloved urban neighbourhood that has attained legendary status.

Read, look and enjoy.

A new collection of Simchovitch's poetry

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Canadian Jewish poet, novelist and scholar, Sam (Simcha) Simchovitch, recently published a book of collected Yiddish poems titled Dem Netzach Antkegn (Toward Eternity).

The poems were taken from three of his former Yiddish Collections: Sorrow and Consolation (Montreal, 1989), Luminous Autumn (Toronto, 1990), and Sparks in Embers (Toronto, 1997), all limited edition books that are no longer available.

Der Netzach Antkegn, Simchovitch's 14th book, is arranged in five sections that reflect the poet's life over more than half a century – Home and Homelessness; Memorial Lights – Holocaust-Yizkor; Towards Peaceful Shores (coming and settling in Canada); Yiddish Sounds; and Pure Tears (on old age and other topics).

Simchovitch was born in Otwock (Otvotsk), Poland, in 1921. He was 18 when he ran away with a few others on Sept. 7, 1939, a week after the Germans attacked. He fled to the Soviet Union and after the war, returned to Otwock, where he found all of his family had perished along with almost all the 14,000 Jews in the town.

He spent eight months in France and immigrated to Canada in 1949 with his wife and daughter. He taught in Hebrew schools in Montreal and Ottawa and came to Toronto in 1967 as principal of the Borochov School. He left to become teacher, librarian and curator of the museum at Beth Tzedec Congregation.

He retired from full-time work in 1989 and says that is when he began writing more seriously. He still works at the Beth Tzedec Museum part time.

His works have received international acclaim. He was honoured for his literary work with the J.I. Segal and Chaim Zhitlowski awards and has received a number of literary prizes from the Toronto Jewish Book Awards.

Simchovitch has written in Yiddish, Hebrew and English. His writings are a historical record. From his European shtetl childhood, through the war years to the rebuilding of a new life in Canada, he has filled his works with optimism and gratitude. They speak for the millions of Jews, especially for the young generation of Jews who did not survive, and for those, like himself, who rose to overcome their grief and pain.

Simchovitch, who contributes articles, poems and book reviews to the Yiddish Forward in New York, is preparing an edition of his collected poems in English titled Out of the Abyss, which will appear this summer.

In one of his poems, Simchovitch laments that there were once more than 20 noted Yiddish writers in Canada. Today, there are only a few.

Dem Netzach Antkegn (Towards Eternity) was funded by Velvel Katz and his daughter Ida Abrams in honour of his 105th birthday in August 2002. Katz died in April. It is available at the Negev Book and Gift Store, Israel's The Judaica Centre, or by calling 416-635-7199.

Addiction expert holds seminars in Ottawa

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Abraham Twerski, an ordained rabbi, psychiatry professor and an international authority on chemical dependency visited the national capital recently to speak to educators, social workers, clergy and members of the general public on issues ranging from parenting to domestic violence.

At a professional development seminar for staff of Yitzhak Rabin High School, one of the sponsors of his visit, Rabbi Twerski spoke about bullying.

"Many decades later, I still carry the scars of having been the victim of a bully in grade school," he told his evening audience. The workshop was also attended by members of the general community, including many from social service agencies and those interested in dealing with addictions.

Rabbi Twerski, the author of more than 40 books and a frequent radio and television guest, is the founder and medical director emeritus of Gateway Rehabilitation Center in Pennsylvania and has recently become involved with a rehabilitation centre in Jerusalem known as Shaar Hatikvah, meaning "gateway to hope."

Twerski also met with a group of almost a dozen rabbis to discuss domestic violence in the Jewish community.

"There were a number of issues that we wanted opened up," said Mark Zarecki, executive director of Jewish Family Services of Ottawa, the other sponsor of Rabbi Twerski's visit.

"One of these issues is spousal violence and another is the issue of addictions and alcoholism. It was important for some of the clergy and leadership to hear how they should deal with these issues. The session was scheduled to last one hour, but lasted 2½ hours. They were very open and interested, and we were very, very pleased."

Rabbi Twerski's keynote address at the Soloway Jewish Community Centre attracted a diverse audience of professionals and community members looking for answers to "How to Raise Children in a Violent Society." The Ottawa Police Service and Catholic Family Services also sponsored the lecture.

"Morality has fallen by the wayside; drugs are epidemic," Rabbi Twerski said. "There is no more respect for authority across the board."

That's the bad news, he said. The good news is that if parents show their children by example, leading good lives themselves, and teach respect by being respectful, they may have success.

Citing the Talmud, Rabbi Twerski noted said although God "is the sovereign being of the whole world, he does not control man's moral behaviour. He can control it, but has chosen not to. Control by fear and intimidation is not healthy. Intimidation breeds resentment, not love."

Children must be disciplined, but there is a difference between discipline and abuse, Rabbi Twerski said.

Television and video games expose children to violence, but Rabbi Twerski does not advocate simply banning them. Rather, he suggests that parents tell their children that there are better ways to spend their time.

"We have to find ways to assert the authority of wisdom rather than the authority of power," he said.

Though parenting is a very difficult job, Rabbi Twerski said, he reminded his audience that even "Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, the great patriarchs, did not have much success with their children. We just have to do the best we can."

Mini-golf fundraiser to support Sunnybrook cancer research

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Elayne Kopman was "a wonderful human being" who was dedicated to her family, her friends and her community, so, it seemed fitting to remember her in a way that would carry on her legacy of caring, says her son Richard.

After her recent death from lung cancer at the age of 54, Richard Kopman decided to found the Elayne Kopman Hope for Health Foundation for Cancer Research. The goal is to raise funds for the prevention and treatment of all types of cancer.

In particular, it is now supporting Dr. Neil Berinstein's advanced therapeutics program at Toronto's Sunnybrook Regional Cancer Centre.

Kopman's organization operates under the umbrella of the Hope for Health foundation for Cancer Research, founded by Erle Strauss and Evelyn Pancer. Kopman said that besides moral support and encouragement, Hope for Health offered tactical advice and guidance.

"We wanted to make sure that [any research we supported] was done properly as well as ethically. There is a lot of scam going on."

The first fundraising effort, a squash tournament held at Mayfair Lakeshore Raquet and Fitness Club, this past March raised $9,000. Sixty people took part, said Kopman, who hopes to make the event an annual affair.

The next fundraiser is the Elayne Kopman Mini-Golf Classic, to be held June 22, at the Putting Edge at highways 400 and 7. It is directed at children, but adults are welcome to play with the kids, Kopman said.

In addition to mini-golf, the event will feature a carnival, barbecue, pizza, loot bags, raffles, doughnuts, pop and water – all donated. A number of Toronto Blue Jays mascots will also be on hand to help things along.

There will be four tee-off times, 9 a.m., noon, 4 p.m. and 7 p.m. Pre-registration cost is $25 per child, $40 per adult or $100 for a family of up to 5 people including 2 adults. Tickets can be purchased at the gate for $10 extra per category.

The cost is completely tax deductible.

Kopman has other plans to raise funds, including a wine-tasting evening and a movie premiere.

"We wanted to arrange programs that were just fun, and not connected to illness," he said.

For details, or to register for the mini-golf fundraiser, call 416-485-8407, or e-mail richard@elaynekopman-h4h.org.

The Burial Society full of twists and turns

the opportunity to rent it or purchase it on video or DVD.

The second film, The Burial Society is a small and very original Canadian production. Shorn of all its adornments, this is really a caper film with a number of twists and turns that will keep you guessing, even as the end credits roll.

Sheldon Kasner is a quiet, overworked and under appreciated man who works as the loans manager at the Hebrew National Bank.

Behind the ordinary and often mundane activities of the bank, lies a large money laundering operation and when $2 million goes missing, Sheldon is accused of being responsible.

Sheldon flees for his life and tries to disappear within the ranks of the mysterious workings of a small town Jewish burial society. Sheldon's new found refuge is discovered, but before he can be killed, Sheldon gets the other members of the burial society to help him flee the country.

The problem is that things never seem to turn out the way Sheldon plans.

There are a number of clues and false leads throughout the film and the audience is often left wondering whether Sheldon did it or not.

Rob LaBelle and veteran Canadian actor Jan Rubes star in this somewhat convoluted film that is now available in many video stores throughout the country.

Both videos have been released in Canada by Seville Pictures.

Winnipeg students visit U.S. Holocaust museum

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — For Tali Braunstein, seeing the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C., was a tremendous learning experience.

"I learned a lot of things about the Holocaust I didn't know before," she said. "I learned a lot about propaganda and what really happened, and I also learned about the good people who helped save Jews."

The Winnipegger was among a group of 25 Grade 9 students from her school, out of a total of 106 public school students from Manitoba, who participated in the Asper Foundation Holocaust and Human Rights Studies Program and trip to Washington from May 11 to 14. Another 300 students from 13 cities in 8 provinces went on the same trip earlier this spring.

As far as Holocaust survivor and educator Barbara Goszer is concerned, the Holocaust program "is the best thing the foundation has come up with."

She accompanied the students to Washington. "It was a magnificent experience," said Goszer, who worked with the students for several weeks before the trip.

"The kids were exhilarated and stimulated. It was nice that some of them came up to me while we were touring the museum to ask if I was OK."

The visit to the Holocaust museum was just one part of the Washington experience. The group also visited other key sites and museums, including the Smithsonian Institute and Mount Vernon, George Washington's estate.

The objectives of the Asper Foundation's Holocaust and Human Rights Studies Program are to promote tolerance and sensitize Canadian high school students to the consequences of racism through a specially designed education program, said senior program manager Jeff Morry.

The program was started six years ago in Winnipeg with Grade 8 students from Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate, the city's Jewish high school.

It was subsequently expanded to Jewish Grade 9 students in the city's public schools and is now a national initiative. Almost 30 per cent of program participants are non-Jewish.

All participants take an 18-hour education program on the Holocaust and human rights, with an emphasis on American history and the civil rights movement, Morry said.

The educational component of the program was developed for the Asper Foundation by Holocaust and human rights educators.

After completing the educational component, students head to Washington, D.C., where they spend several days touring the Holocaust museum and other monuments to freedom.

The students are also required to volunteer in their communities on public projects of their choice when they return. The majority of the trip's cost are borne by the Asper Foundation.

In the past six years, almost 1,500 students from a variety of religious backgrounds and more than 30 communities across Canada have participated.

The Asper Foundation was established in Winnipeg in 1983 to further the philanthropic objectives of Israel Asper and the Asper family

Morry said the Asper Foundation is working on a number of significant initiatives, most notably the recent announcement of plans to build a $200 million, 21-storey Canadian Museum for Human Rights in Winnipeg, slated to open in 2007. In addition to the museum's focus on human rights, plans call for it to incorporate the largest Holocaust gallery in Canada.

The Asper Foundation's Holocaust and Human Rights Studies Program will be expanded in coming years to sponsor visits to the museum by 100,000 Canadian high school students each year, Morry said.

Pre-teen tennis star contemplates turning pro

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

At a time when most people her age are gearing up for their last year of elementary school, 12-year-old Sharon Fichman is embarking on the final 18 months of her junior tennis career.

The future star of Canadian tennis is focused on joining the professional ranks in December 2004, when she turns 14 and becomes eligible for the Women's Tennis Association (WTA) tour.

The Toronto native hopes to one day reach the world's top 10. The last Canadian to do so was Carling Bassett-Seguso 18 years ago, when she reached a career-high ranking of number 8.

Fichman recently led Canada's under-14 junior team to a second-place finish in qualifying for this summer's Junior World Championships, to be held Aug. 11 to 16 in the Czech Republic. The team defeated Mexico and Puerto Rico at the North American and Caribbean qualification event before losing to the host United States in the final at Key Biscayne, Fla.

Fichman played in the singles matches and was to have also played doubles against the United States, but a blister on her foot kept her off the court.

Fichman was the lone Canadian of the three-player junior team to sweep her matches, defeating Valeria Pulido of Mexico 6-3, 6-4; Natalia Guevarra of Puerto Rico 6-0, 6-1 and Alexa Gatch of the United States 6-0, 6-4.

Her dramatic singles win over Gatch, the United States 14-and-under national champion, was crucial as Canada lost the other singles and doubles matches to the top-seeded American team. Had Fichman failed to win, Canada would not have advanced to the finals.

The 5-2, 105-lb. righthander established herself on the international tennis scene last fall when she won the Junior Orange Bowl, becoming the first Canadian to take home the title since Bassett-Seguso won it in 1979.

She won the Miami event without dropping a set. Two weeks earlier, Fichman captured both the singles and doubles crowns at the Eddie Herr International in Bradenton, Fla., one of the largest junior tennis championships in the United States.

"I know [Tennis Canada] is expecting I'm the next big star," said Fichman, who captured her first national title at the end of March by winning the Canadian under-14 indoor tennis championships in Repentigny, Que. "If it does happen, I'm going to love what I do. I just play tennis for myself."

It's an attitude Fichman has adopted so the pressure to perform doesn't become overwhelming.

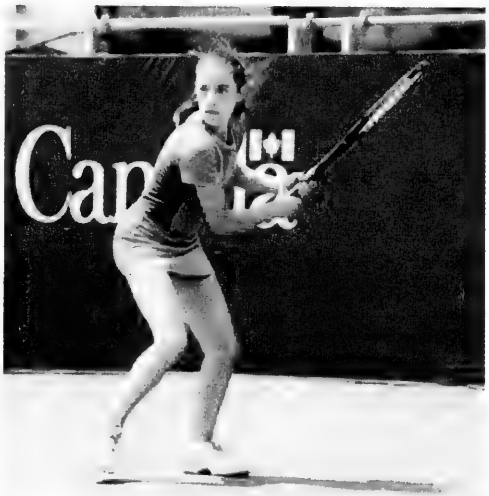
After winning her first tournament, the Open Benjamins, in Bordeaux, France, in October 2001 in the under-12 singles category, Fichman admits it "kind of got to her" and she was a bit nervous showing up to future competitions.

"Since then, I kind of learned my lesson," she said. "I now try to put it behind me and keep going."

The Grade 7 student at Forest Hill Public School is on the court about three hours a day, fine-tuning her game with coach Ben Armstrong. Fichman is interested in attending UCLA after her career ends and said she may one day become a tennis coach.

She expects to represent Canada in two years time at the Maccabiah Games in Israel, but for the time being she is hopeful that she'll qualify for next year's junior French Open at Roland Garros Stadium in Paris.

"I grew up playing on clay," said Fichman, who trains on hard courts, but says the red clay at Roland Garros is her favourite surface. "I won my first big tournament on it. I just love the feel of it."



Tennis Canada vice-president Stacey Allaster said a lot of hard work lies ahead for the young prodigy to get to Paris next May.

"She's off to a great start," Allaster said. "She's going to have to play a lot more junior international events and get her ranking up so that she would qualify just like she would if she were playing on the main tour."

"Sharon may have a good career, but it's too early to know," said Rene Simpson, coach of the Canadian Federation Cup team and the current women's Canadian 35-and-under national champion, who has worked extensively with Fichman over the past year.

"I would not advise Sharon or anyone to turn pro, unless you really have no competition at your level. You really have to prove yourself fast at age 16," said Simpson, who played on the pro circuit for 10 years.

"Sharon has a lot of hustle, great shots and the most important quality that you just can't teach: a big heart. Sharon never gives up to any opponent. That attitude alone will make her prevail over many players," added Simpson.

BJCC gears up for first ever golf tournament

By NEIL BECKER
Special to The CJN

There is a buzz in the air at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre as time ticks down to the centre's First Annual Golf Tournament.

At 8 a.m. on Monday, June 16, as many as 72 golfers are expected to tee off at the Carrying Place Golf & Country Club for what organizers are hoping will be a day of food, fun and camaraderie.

"It will be a scramble/best-ball format," said Jim Emery, the BJCC's director of facilities. "The funds from this tournament will go towards equipment improvements such as treadmills and bikes along with various programs."

The idea of a fun-filled golf outing was hatched by a group of guys from the men's health club who wanted to combine their love of the sport with a chance to kibbitz with friends.

"So far, everyone is excited and starting to talk about it," says Emery. "We're expecting a lot of laughs and you don't have to be a champion golfer to play."

In addition to receiving breakfast, lunch and 18 holes of golf at a championship course, participants will vie for a number of prizes, with contests for the longest drive and closest to the pin.

The entry fee is $175.00 per person.

For more information, contact Emery at 416-636-1880 ext. 371.

On being different

By JODI KOVITZ

A year ago, I saw Trembling Before God, a documentary about faith, sexuality and religious fundamentalism. In the film, intimate personal stories of Orthodox Jews who are gay or lesbian serve to illustrate the philosophical problem they face: how can one who is gay be devoted to Judaism and God when homosexuality is prohibited in the Bible?

Sadly, the film also illustrates how isolating it can feel to admit to being "different" within the Jewish community.

As 20-somethings, most of us go through the process of exploring and evaluating ourselves in order to discover who we really are and what we want out of our lives. We struggle to accept and love ourselves, despite those things that make us different. For some, being 20-something can be a really difficult time, particularly if we are confronting the issue of how to carve out an alternative lifestyle in what can feel like a rather homogenous community.

What makes it so difficult to come out as a gay or lesbian 20-something in the Jewish community? Aside from the religious conflict that most Jews may face in being gay or lesbian, the difficulty for many people seems to arise as a result of cultural norms, expectations and the associated pressure.

One friend of mine who is a lesbian (out only to several close friends) relayed her feelings about coming out to me. She said, "There is immense pressure on us 20-somethings to get married, form our own 'traditional' families, and continue to grow the Jewish community.

"I fear coming out," she continued, "because I want so badly to just have that and be happy with it. I know inevitably I will have to admit to myself out loud how I really feel, because living in silence and pretending that I want to get married to a man is excruciating. I feel isolated from my family, and in turn from my community."

A colleague recently told me about his experience coming out. He said the most difficult part of it for him was the fear of disappointing his parents. He knew that they wanted him to marry a "nice Jewish girl," have babies, a house and a dog, just as they had done and everyone else's kids in the community seemed to be doing.

It was encouraging to me to discover that his parents were incredibly supportive when he came out.

He said, "I've learned through my own experience that it is not actually as hard as it seems. I think all it takes is some belief in yourself and those people around you."

Where can young adults turn for support in coming to terms with their Jewish and sexual identities? One great community resource for group and individual counselling for Jewish people who are gay and lesbian and their friends and family is Jewish Family and Child Service of Toronto. They can be reached at 416-638-7800. In addition, Lesbian, Gay & Bisexual Youth of Toronto (LGBYT) is a group that offers support to Jewish youth 25 years and under through programs and group meetings. Check out www.lgbyt.org.

Can 20-something Jewish Canadians who are gay come out and live open, happy lives? Of course they can. I think that we, as friends, family and members of the community can help make the process of accepting different sexual orientation and exploring alternative concepts of family a little easier by continuing to express our understanding, acceptance and tolerance of difference.

Epi on Education

Seymour Epstein

Some parents have been very vocal about the serious tuition increases at some of the Jewish day schools for the 2003-04 academic year. There have been school meetings, parent protest meetings and suggestions about how to respond. There has also been criticism about how education is organized and funded in the community.

In this limited space, I would like to provide the facts as I know them from my perspective.

Everyone knows that it is increasingly expensive to be Jewish in Toronto. Many of us in organized Jewish life, professionals and volunteers, are very concerned about middle-income and low-income families, who must be included in community life.

Regarding the specific issue of day-school tuition, the Toronto Jewish community has a unique program, unparalleled elsewhere, that provides assistance to parents who cannot afford full tuition.

Over the last 10 years alone, close to $70 million dollars has been spent in this program. It's true that the amount available was capped some years ago, but because we have all felt the severity of the need, many community leaders have been working diligently to find funds to increase the annual budget. This year, there will be a significant increase, soon to be announced.

Quietly and without deserved recognition, professional staff and experienced volunteers work constantly to monitor the equitable distribution of the funds in the tuition subsidy program. They inspect the work of school tuition committees, offer training to schools, write tuition guidelines and analyze the finances of funded schools.

UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education studies enrolment trends in order to help schools recruit new students. Every effort is made to make access to our schools universal.

Parents must concern themselves with the education of their own children within the limits of their household budgets, but it is important to know that both in the administrations of individual schools and in the organized community, there are many concerned Jews who devote time and energy to worrying about the schooling of all children at rates that all of us can afford – individuals and the community.

Sharon puts Hamas on notice

Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon told the cabinet during its weekly meeting Sunday that Israel will continue to take action against what it calls the "ticking bombs" of terrorists. He also said Israel has American approval to carry out such operations, even in Palestinian areas. The government has said that any Hamas member will be a target for elimination. There were reports that the U.S. administration had asked the Israeli government to stop targeted attacks. Israel said that if the Palestinian Authority is not going to rein in its terrorists, then the Israel Defence Forces will do so.

UJA Fed. adds $1 million to Jewish education budget

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

For the first time in more than 10 years, UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education has approved a funding increase for tuition subsidies and educational programs.

Last week, it committed more than $1 million in new money to Jewish education for next year, raising the total amount set aside for tuition assistance and programs to $11.1 million.

Subsidies, which are given to parents of Jewish day school students who can't afford full Jewish school tuition fees, were increased by $900,000 to a total of $7.85 million.

The board also approved $120,000 to be added to the existing $3.14 million already directed at educational programs, which include grants for educators and institutions, teacher certification and professional development.

First subsidy increase in more than 10 years

"The increase of $900,000 for family assistance is part of an overall plan to widen access to families who want to send their children to day schools," said BJE chair Marshall Kesten.

Kesten said "the additional funds will allow the BJE to provide a measure of relief for middle-income parents through an adjustment to tuition subsidy guidelines," which are tables used to establish subsidy allocations for families in each income level lines are established, the board is hoping that more middle-income earners will be able to able to qualify for subsidies, Kesten said.

There are 2,700 students on subsidies at 15 BJE-affiliated day schools (elementary and secondary) that are currently eligible for tuition assistance.

Seymour Epstein, BJE executive, said, "UJA Federation is very sympathetic to families of all income levels and understands that sacrifices need to be made to send children to Jewish day schools."

The News in Brief

Canada

CJC Meets Ministers

OTTAWA — Canadian Jewish Congress leaders, including president Keith Landy and executive vice-president Jack Silverstone, met Solicitor General Wayne Easter and Justice Minister Martin Cauchon in separate sessions last week to discuss issues that included anti-Semitism, terrorism, community security and war crimes. In a release, CJC said it thanked Easter for putting Hezbollah on Ottawa's list of terror groups banned in Canada, along with others that target Israel and Jews such as Islamic Jihad and the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade, and urged him to add the Tanzim militia to the list. CJC also "stressed the importance of strong unequivocal denunciations by political leaders" of anti-Semitism and noted a number of university campuses as "hotbeds of anti-Semitic activity," Landy said. CJC also lamented the lack of progress in prosecuting Nazi war criminals, noting that no new cases have been started in the last two years.

Israel

Red Cross Makes Deal

JERUSALEM — The International Committee of the Red Cross and Magen David Adom signed their first co-operation agreement last week. Francois Bellon, head of the ICRC delegation, said it would "assist the MDA in its tireless efforts to save lives and alleviate human suffering, without discrimination." MDA's emergency medical service, which includes funding to train paramedics, is the focus of ICRC support. The two groups had not signed any previous agreements because of pressure from Arab and Muslim countries.

Dead Sea Water Project

JERUSALEM — Israel and Jordan are working on a joint project to save the evaporating Dead Sea. The project, which calls for a canal and pipe system to transfer water from the Red Sea to the Dead Sea, will be presented at an international conference in Jordan this week. The World Bank has pledged most of the funding to dig the canal.

Muslims Polled on Israel

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Many Muslims, including 80 per cent of Palestinians, believe the Palestinians can't achieve independence as long as Israel exists, says a May poll by the Pew Global Attitudes Project. It surveyed more than 15,000 people in Muslim countries and asked if they agreed with the statement "the rights and needs of the Palestinian people cannot be taken care of as long as the State of Israel exists." Ninety per cent of Moroccans agreed, as did 85 per cent of Jordanians, 72 per cent of Kuwaitis, 65 per cent of Lebanese, 58 per cent of Indonesians and 57 per cent of Pakistanis.

Germany Funds Jews

BERLIN — Germany's Parliament approved a deal June 13 that will triple government funding to the country's Jewish community. The move endorsed the agreement reached in January between German Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder and German Jewish leader Paul Spiegel that gives the Jewish community the same legal standing as the Roman Catholic and Lutheran churches. As a result, the Central Council of Jews in Germany will receive an annual stipend of about $3.5 million (US).

Belgian Case to Proceed

BRUSSELS — A lawsuit against a senior Israeli official for alleged crimes against humanity can continue, a Belgian court ruled last week. The suit was filed under Belgium's universal jurisdiction law by Palestinian survivors of the 1982 Sabra and Shatila massacre, carried out by Lebanese Christian militias. It was filed against Amos Yaron, head of Israeli forces in Beirut in 1982 and now director general of Israel's Defence Ministry. Israel recently said it will boycott all further proceedings in the case, saying Belgian officials are politically biased. Belgian courts recently modified the law to allow the transfer to U.S. courts of a suit filed against the first president Bush over the 1991 Persian Gulf War.

Promise to Release Files

BUENOS AIRES — Argentina will release secret evidence related to a 1994 bombing at a Jewish community centre that killed 85 people. Argentine Jewish leaders welcomed Nestor Kirchner's announcement, made June 5, less than two weeks after he was elected president. "It is the most important news in nine years," said Abraham Kaul, the head of the AMIA Jewish centre, where the bombing occurred. Argentine Jews have long pushed for intensifying investigations into the AMIA bombing and into a 1992 bombing at the Israeli Embassy in Buenos Aires that killed 29.

Paper Apologizes for Editorial Cartoon

CHICAGO — Chicago's Jewish leaders are accepting an apology from the Chicago Tribune for an editorial cartoon that many viewed as anti-Semitic.

An editorial apologizing for the May 30 cartoon appeared Sunday in the Tribune, alongside a letter by Lester Rosenberg, chairman of the board of the Jewish United Fund/Jewish Federation of Metropolitan Chicago.

The paper acknowledged the cartoon "is not just offensive. The content was wrong, dangerous and anti-Semitic," said the federation's executive vice-president, Michael Kotzin.

The cartoon depicted a kneeling U.S. President George W. Bush laying out dollar bills on a "pathway for peace" viewed by a hook-nosed likeness of Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon with a Star of David on his jacket. Sharon stares at the money and says, "On second thought, the pathway to peace is looking a bit brighter." On the other end, Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat waits with arms crossed.

The cartoon's erroneous message, critics said, is that Israel's motivation for peace is triggered not by a desire to end bloodshed but by U.S. dollars.

Ahenakew charged with promoting hate

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Six months ago, aboriginal leader David Ahenakew stunned the nation with an anti-Semitic diatribe that praised Adolf Hitler, called Jews a "disease" and suggested Jews had it coming when Hitler "fried" six million of them.

Last week, Saskatchewan's department of public prosecutions announced Ahenakew had been charged with promoting hatred under section 319(2) of the Criminal Code. He could face two years in jail if convicted.

At the same time, the advisory council that determines membership in the Order of Canada said it would defer discussing Ahenakew's continued membership until the legal proceedings end.

Jewish groups applauded the decision to charge Ahenakew, who once served as chief of the national Assembly of First Nations (AFN).

"All of us are very pleased with the fact justice is going to take place," said June Avivi, chair of the Saskatchewan region of Canadian Jewish Congress.

CJC's national office concurred.

"The statements made could hardly have been more hateful," said CJC president Keith Landy. "The law was introduced precisely to protect groups identified by such characteristics as race, religion and ethnic origin from publicly-expressed views that vilify and attack them and thereby undermine the promotion of justice, tolerance and respect for diversity in Canadian society."

Chief Perry Bellegarde of the Federation of Saskatchewan Indian Nations (FSIN) would not comment on the legal process, but noted the FSIN had distanced itself from Ahenakew's remarks months ago. He stressed that Ahenakew's remarks did not represent those of the FSIN.

Ahenakew landed in hot water in mid-December when, addressing the FSIN, he applauded Hitler. Asked by a reporter from the Saskatoon Star Phoenix to repeat his comments, Ahenakew said, "That's how Hitler came in. He was going to make damn sure the Jews didn't take over Germany and Europe. That's why he fried six million of those guys, you know. Jews would have owned the goddamned world. And look what they're doing. They're killing people in Arab countries."

Avivi said the Ahenakew affair, coupled with an earlier firebomb attack on the Saskatoon synagogue, left the community on edge. But it also prompted the Jewish and native communities to draw closer. "We have started to build bridges between us," she said.

The local community was gratified when native leaders condemned quickly Ahenakew's remarks, though a decision in February by the FSIN's senate to reinstate Ahenakew after he had been removed "gave us some shivers."

That decision was reversed by Bellegarde, who attributed it to organizational politics and Ahenakew calling in favours.

Bellegarde said relations with the Jewish community are "positive."

"We've basically broken bread together and seen each other as people." That marks an important step in building relations and educating each side about the other, he said.

Native leaders attended a Shabbat dinner at Congregation Agudas Israel as well as the community's Yom Hashoah commemoration. Members of the Jewish community participated in an aboriginal feast and round dance.

The result is that relations, which were virtually non-existent on the organizational level, have improved, Avivi said.

That pattern has repeated on a national level, said Manuel Prutschi, CJC's national director of community relations.

Only a few weeks ago, Ted Moses, grand chief of the Grand Council of the Crees, addressed CJC's Quebec plenary. As well, in the aftermath of Ahenakew's remarks, AFN national chief Matthew Coon Come attended services and spoke at a Montreal synagogue – a "very powerful and forthright gesture," Prutschi said.

"There has been an outpouring of solidarity and support" from a number of aboriginal groups.

"A lot of activity has been aimed at not letting the incident damage the longstanding relations between the two communities, and it has led to stronger and more intense bonds across the country," he added.

Tribute to a community

From the editor's desk

The Jewish people has a very close relationship with history. Indeed, our sacred texts canonize history. History bids us, as Jews, to know who we are and to strive constantly, while glancing back, to fulfil our personal destinies, within life's limitless possibilities, as members of this small-numbered, remarkable people.

Memory, of course, is history's key custodian. Our family structure, our faith, our traditions, our symbols, our education system and our communal life are aimed in large part at preserving memory, thereby passing from one generation to the next a profound awareness of our history.

The inauguration last week of the renovated Montreal Holocaust Memorial Museum was a rare, poignant example of the conjoining of history, memory and community.

As has been noted elsewhere in this issue, more than 1,000 people gathered at the Gelber Conference Centre to dedicate the re-opening of the museum.

Montreal's community leaders decided some time ago that on the eve of the museum's 25th year, it would be vastly enhanced, a solemn shrine to the millions murdered, but also a dynamic, living centre where individuals would come "to learn, to feel and to remember."

The inauguration ceremony was primarily about the museum itself, its archives, artifacts, meditative and teaching spaces. It was also about the survivors whose lives inspired it.

Indeed, one of the most touching moments in the event program was a presentation by Sara Schichter, a Jew from Belgium, who recounted some of the details of the story of her survival from the Nazi killing machine.

It was a story movingly told.

In an elegant and understated manner, she told the audience of the last time she saw her mother, of her escape into the woods, and of the brave woman who risked her own life to save that of a frightened fellow human being, detested by the Nazi-ruled authorities, reviled for being Jewish and hunted as unfit to live any longer on Belgian soil.

Time and again, speakers emphasized that the museum would soon take its place in the country's national roster of museums and special halls of learning. To be sure, it will become a hallowed space for Canadian Jews, but it will also be a vital educational space for Canadians in general.

But there was an additional excitement to the evening. There was a sense too that the ceremony was also about the centuries-old community whose steely resolve and clear-eyed determination had given the museum life.

The wide, trans-jurisdictional array of elected and other public officials who attended the event was visible proof of this. They were at the ceremony to acknowledge the new museum, but their very presence paid tribute in a profound way to the venerable Jewish community of Montreal, or as Haim Divon, Israel's ambassador to Canada, referred to it, the "cradle of Jewish life in Canada."

Mayor Gérald Tremblay expressed how proud he was that his city would be the site of this new important institution. In almost poetic cadence, he offered his personal statement, ever mindful of the significance of the moment, that he was at the ceremony in sadness, yet full of hope as well. The occasion was one for remembering the past, but it would also serve to protect the future, Tremblay said.

The provincial government was represented by the recently elected premier, Jean Charest, and by his predecessor, now the leader of the Opposition, Bernard Landry. Former premier Lucien Bouchard, who was also in attendance, "spoke" to the audience about the museum's importance by way of a videotaped message.

Relaxed and feeling quite at home with the large assembly, Charest tried to place the catastrophe that befell the Jews into a historical context. He lamented that it had been "remarkable how the rest of the world had turned its back" upon the Jews of Europe. As an example of the world's utter indifference to the Jews' plight, Charest cited the ultimately ineffectual conference of European, American and Australian officials on refugee problems [that is, rescue of the Jews] held in Evian-les-Bains in France in 1938.

Charest was especially moved, he told the audience, by one artifact in particular in the museum: a gift for Fania Fainer, an inmate in one of the camps, that was made by some of her fellow inmates to celebrate her 20th birthday. The gift, Charest said, his voice heavy with emotion, was a testament to the strength of the love among friends that could not be vanquished, even in the camps.

Federal Revenue Minister Elinor Caplan spoke on behalf of the federal government and invited "all Canadians to come to Montreal to see the museum, and to learn from it" in order to strengthen Canada's pluralistic society.

Bloc Quebecois leader Gilles Duceppe also briefly addressed the audience. But the most rousing oration was delivered by Montreal-area MP and Liberal leadership hopeful Paul Martin.

In a well-researched speech that featured a number of Jewish themes, Martin was the only speaker to overtly and directly draw a connection between the destruction of European Jewry and the founding of Israel, whose existence, he said to loud, cascading applause, should never be placed in doubt. —MBD

Abbas said incapable of fulfilling road map obligations

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Mahmoud Abbas, the recently appointed prime minister of the Palestinian Authority, is incapable of ending terrorism and thereby fulfilling a key condition of the road map, the internationally sponsored peace plan supported and promoted by the United States.

This is the sombre assessment of Barry Rubin, an Israeli expert on the Middle East and a biographer of Abbas' powerful rival, PA President Yasser Arafat.

"It's finished," Rubin said last week about the road map. "Nothing is going to happen. [Abbas] has already failed, though I don't say this unsympathetically."

Here as a guest of the Canada-Israel Committee, Rubin made his comments a day after Hamas, Islamic Jihad and the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade, in a joint attack, killed four Israeli soldiers in the Gaza Strip, and just days after Hamas broke off ceasefire talks with Abbas.

Rubin said Abbas' objective is to co-opt radicals opposed to the road map, and his refusal to crack down on extremist groups out of fear of touching off a Palestinian civil war shows he is an ineffective leader.

"It's hopeless," declared Rubin, director of global research at the Interdisciplinary Center, Israel's first private university, based in Herzliyah.

"He won't accomplish anything. Abbas can't change things, and he's already seen as a loser. This is only clear now, though we had feared the worst."

In a bold remark, Rubin claimed that the road map will not be implemented as long as Arafat wields power.

"[Abbas] has no authority and he won't accumulate any," he said.

Rubin said Arafat has created a new body, the National Security Council, to control the security forces and the peace process. He has also placed loyalists in the PA ministry of the interior and has ordered regional governors to report directly to him rather than Abbas.

Barry Rubin

"Arafat runs everything," asserted Rubin, whose latest book, Yasser Arafat: A Political Biography, will be published by Oxford University Press in August.

Rubin said that few important Palestinian figures support the policies identified with Abbas: sidelining Arafat, demilitarizing the intifadah and reaching a compromise agreement with Israel.

If Abbas fails to enforce his will on the Palestinians, Israel will not ease its array of restrictions on the Palestinian population in the West Bank and Gaza, Rubin warned.

The Palestinians, in any event, are not in a mood for serious compromises, he said, citing a new Pew poll that showed 80 per cent of Palestinians think their national rights can't be fulfilled by a two-state solution.

Rubin envisages no letup in terrorism directed at Israel.

"The Palestinians are continuing on the same strategy of the past 2½ years," he said, referring to the intifadah.

Without committing himself to a timeline, Rubin predicted that the intifadah will eventually collapse. "Israeli security measures have had an effect, and the Palestinian public is exhausted."

Asked whether he agrees with Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's view that Arafat is "irrelevant," Rubin said Arafat is relevant to the current political situation but irrelevant to making peace.

Comparing Arafat's goals with those of Abbas, Rubin said Arafat is prepared to accept a two-state solution, provided he is not required to sign an end-of-conflict accord with Israel and Palestinian refugees are permitted to return to Israel.

By contrast, Abbas is ready to sign a deal based on a plan submitted by former U.S. president Bill Clinton in 2001: the virtual withdrawal of Israeli forces from the West Bank and all of Gaza, shared sovereignty in eastern Jerusalem and the resettlement of refugees in a new Palestinian state.

In Rubin's estimation, the "right of return" issue will be the most difficult to resolve.

For now, he noted, the Palestinians are convinced that Israel does not want peace. As a result, they tend to demonize all Israeli prime ministers, from Sharon to the late Yitzhak Rabin.

Rubin believes that Sharon is capable of signing a permanent status agreement with the Palestinians, despite his stated preference for long-term interim accords.

Rubin said Sharon is a pragmatist rather than an ideologue, and under the right conditions, he would relinquish most of the settlements in the territories.

"Sharon is not the man he's portrayed to be," said Rubin. "He is 75 and he's interested in his image in history."

Nevertheless, Rubin added, Sharon would probably not offer the Palestinians the sweeping territorial concessions put forward by his predecessor, Labor's Ehud Barak.

Rubin said that in the wake of the war of Iraq, Israel's strategic position has never been better.

"Arab states have essentially abandoned the military struggle against Israel. The existential danger to Israel is no more."

Peace camp urged to speak out more forcefully

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

In the face of continuing Arab-Israeli violence, Israel's mainstream peace movement has fallen short of the mark by failing to raise its voice courageously enough, the keynote speaker at a Jewish peace conference said here recently.

Israeli peace activist Terry Greenblatt said Israeli activists have not conveyed the message that the Palestinians are ready to negotiate an agreement with Israel.

"We have a partner," said Greenblatt, director of Bat Shalom, a Jerusalem-based feminist organization that advocates a two-state solution.

But Israeli peaceniks have not sufficiently conveyed this idea to Israelis. "That voice wasn't heard," she told the Jewish Voices for Peace and Justice conference, held earlier this month at the University of Toronto.

Greenblatt, an American who has lived in Israel for the past 33 years, levelled the accusation after being asked whether Palestinians feel betrayed by the Israeli peace camp.

But she tempered her analysis by acknowledging that Israel's peace movement has lost momentum since the outbreak of the second Palestinian uprising almost three years ago.

"Our ranks have shrunk dramatically," she said.

Greenblatt, who is also co-founder of the Kol Ha-Isha Feminist Center in Jerusalem, said that women have an "exceptional role" to play in bringing peace to Israel.

Describing her work as a "constant struggle," and herself as a "disobedient" voice in the global Jewish community, she said, "It is hard to defy the wisdom of the tribe."

Greenblatt said efforts are being made in the Diaspora to silence dissent and criticism of Israel's policies.

And in Israel itself, the notion that Palestinians in the territories should be transferred, or expelled, is gaining ground, she added.

Bat Shalom's mission, she explained to an audience of about 175 kindred spirits, is to challenge the dogma that Israel has no negotiating partner among the Palestinians.

If there is to be peace, Israel must withdraw to pre-1967 lines, share Jerusalem and resolve the Palestinian refugee problem, Greenblatt said.

She noted that the road map, the internationally-sponsored peace plan, is an improvement over the Oslo peace process because of its explicit call for a Palestinian state.

During the question-and-answer period, an unidentified Palestinian woman claimed that Bat Shalom's headquarters lies on land her grandfather donated to a children's park.

Taking issue with Greenblatt's advocacy of a two-state solution, the woman demanded the full "right of return" for Palestinian refugees to what is now Israel. She said they can go back to their old villages.

Sheryl Nestel, one of the organizers of the conference, said the event was held in solidarity with Israeli and Palestinian groups that refuse to regard each other as enemies.

Saying that a vital Jewish Diaspora cannot exist without diversity and dissent, she noted that Israel has yet to come to terms with the need to withdraw to its 1967 borders.

The conference ended with a series of workshops on topics ranging from "Jewish Ethics, Jewish Law and the Occupation" to "Creating Jewish/Arab Dialogue."

It was sponsored by several organizations: Jewish Youth Against the Occupation, Jewish Women's Committee to End the Occupation of the West Bank and Gaza, Ad Hoc Committee for a Jewish Anti-Occupation Ad in the Toronto Star, Yosher Jewish Network for Social Justice, Tikkun Community Toronto and the Toronto's Women's Bookstore.

Baycrest questions link to N. Carolina SARS case

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Controversy broke out last week between Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care and public health officials over how a 47-year old North Carolina man contracted SARS after a visit to Toronto in May.

The man was visiting a relative on the third floor of Baycrest's hospital. Five days later, the relative's roommate and the roommate's wife developed SARS. (Immediately after spiking a temperature, the roommate was transferred to an acute care hospital.)

Baycrest has always insisted that none of the four people had previously shown any symptoms of SARS, or any other illness, and exposure to someone with symptoms is thought to be the only way to contract the illness.

But Dr. James Young, Ontario commissioner of public safety, said further investigation revealed the roommate's wife was coughing when the North Carolina man, a business consultant at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill, was in the room.

Late last week, both the World Health Organization and the U.S. Centers for Disease Control confirmed him as a likely SARS case, Baycrest officials said. Last Saturday, he was released from home quarantine after being symptom-free for 10 days.

The case was said to be a key factor in WHO considerations about whether to issue a second travel advisory against Toronto – it didn't – and led to its decision to downgrade Toronto to an area with "pattern C" SARS transmission.

(A "pattern A" country has cases passed from patients to health-care workers. In "Pattern B" countries, they have also passed from health-care workers to their family members. In "pattern C" countries, transmission has occurred to people who aren't readily recognized as having come into contact with known SARS cases.)

Baycrest president and CEO Stephen Herbert sent a message to his staff last week objecting to media reports the Baycrest exposure was "conclusive." He noted that the patient's wife did not have symptoms at the time of contact, including a cough, and did not show any symptoms until five to six days later.

As well, he said Baycrest physician Terumi Izukawa spoke to the North Carolina man, who reported no direct contact with the patient or his visitors.

"It is also unusual that if there was exposure, no one else got sick," Herbert said in his message to staff.

Herbert told The CJN that last Thursday, Baycrest officials met with Young, Colin D'Cunha, Ontario's chief medical officer of health, and Phil Hassan, Ontario's deputy minister of health.

"They have the same concerns that we do" as to "how someone could get SARS when no one showed symptoms, and there was no contact," Herbert said.

Both facts were verified by the North Carolina man on two separate occasions, he said. Public health officials still consider the case open and are continuing to review it, he added.

Herbert said screening at Baycrest, as at other institutions, is very strict. All entry to the main complex is limited to one door, and all visitors must complete a screening form, have their temperatures taken and wash their hands.

As well, to help track visitors, he said Baycrest has instituted a new procedure, in which a form is posted on each resident's or patient's door to record visitors' names and the time they visited.

Herbert said the case raises the question of whether people always tell the truth on the screening form, especially if they are desperate to see a loved one.

He said that with all the media attention on the situation, people are aware of its seriousness. "We need to rely on people answering truthfully."

In related news, an unconfirmed report in the Jerusalem Post last week said a young man who recently returned from Toronto is in a Tel Aviv hospital showing symptoms of SARS.

Learning summer's weight loss secrets

Why dieting for the swimsuit season is the biggest mistake you can make!

This is the time of year when everywhere you look you see images of sleek, toned bodies. It's also a time when many feel the pressure to resort to crash diets, hoping to fit into a smaller swimsuit size in a few weeks' time. It's also no surprise that weight-loss centres offer specials during the summer months and magazines tout diets that promise losses of 10, 15, and even 20 pounds in less than a month's time.

Unfortunately, quick-fix and fad diets come with a painful price tag. Only 12% of those who lose weight on a crash diet maintain the weight loss for one year. The other 88% not only gain back the weight much sooner, but many gain back even more than they lost. After gaining weight back, demoralized dieters, feeling like failures, often abandon all hope of ever reaching a weight that they can feel healthy and happy about.

Nutritionists and medical experts have come down hard on crash diets for these very reasons. Diets can't produce long-term results because they focus solely on short-term success. They force you to think about — even count — every bite you eat instead of helping to change the way you think about food. Eating habits are deeply ingrained in our subconscious mind. Without changing these habits, dieters fall into the same traps of cravings, binging, and emotional eating over and over again.

There IS another way. With hypnosis, you can make the necessary changes on the subconscious level that will enable you to lose the weight you want to lose and KEEP IT OFF.

Call today for your free weight loss consultation. No diets. No gimmicks. Just a no-risk guarantee and the opportunity to make lasting positive changes. You have nothing to lose but excess baggage. Call TODAY. The beach — and your smaller-size swimsuit — are waiting.

The West too is threatened

As of this writing, Israeli and Palestinian Authority (PA) officials are still discussing ways to undertake mutually beneficial security arrangements. Against the backdrop of the carnage that was let loose last week by the triumphalist terror trio of Hamas, Islamic Jihad and the Al Aqsa Martyrs' Brigade, the discussions seem almost surreal. In a sense they are. But they are also an indication of how determined Israel is in its pursuit of peace with the Palestinian Authority.

But Israel's determination to achieve peace does not override its equal determination to bring down the terror structure. Indeed, only if Israel succeeds in the latter will it enhance the possibilities of finally achieving peace.

For that reason alone, all countries who wish to see the Palestinians and the Israelis living side by side, at peace, should join the effort to totally dismantle the terrorist infrastructure. The radical and Islamist Palestinians are themselves holding back the independence, progress and prosperity of their own people. And it has always been that way.

But there are also other reasons why peace-loving nations should coalesce around the elimination of terror. It is, simply, the correct, moral, humane thing to do.

Last week, after the latest Hamas atrocity aboard a bus, which killed 17 people in Jerusalem, in a statement so stupendously hypocritical it presupposed total sensory blindness on the part of the western world, Hamas announced that it "will target every Zionist occupying [its] land... Every Israeli has become a target."

Every Israeli is already a target for Hamas. Every Israeli has been a target. That is precisely why Hamas, its operatives and collaborators choose to bomb buses, shopping malls, discotheques and pizzerias. Hamas' pronouncement would be laughable if it were not utterly vile and obscene.

There can be no compromise with Hamas or with other like-minded organizations, because their main ambition is the annihilation of the Jewish state. Hamas is opposed to peace with Israel because it is opposed to Israel. Period. Thus, as recent history has shown, each time a peace process has been launched between Israel and the PA, Hamas has launched its blood-letting terror.

If the West is truly interested in advancing peace, it is time for the countries of the West to unambiguously denounce Hamas, to firmly tell Hamas that the West will never allow Israel's existence as a Jewish state to be threatened. The Canadian government should have the courage of its often expressed convictions about its friendship with Israel and take the lead.

Islamic radicals target Israel because it is a Jewish state. They also target Israel because it is a western state. As we have already seen in North America, Europe and Australia, the threat is not very far away from our shores and our streets.

Says CJN is anti-Alliance

I read your editorial "Concerning our Federal Leaders" with outright disgust (CJN, June 5). How can you comment on the leaders of the federal government and completely ignore Stephen Harper, the leader of the Opposition, and the Canadian Alliance? This is not the first time your newspaper has willfully omitted the party. Why does it pain you to admit that the Alliance has proven to be Israel's only friend in Parliament? To continue to shun the second largest party in Canada does not lend credibility to your paper. Thankfully, the majority of the Jewish community stands by the actions of the only true friend of Israel and Jewish causes, the Canadian Alliance.

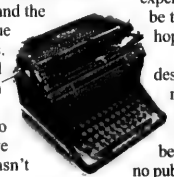
Says CJN is anti-NDP

The editorial contempt for Jack Layton's attempts to regain Jewish support for the NDP is yet another example of this newspaper's contempt for anything progressive ("Concerning our Federal Leaders," CJN, June 5). The CJN has demonstrated a similar slant on the U.S.-led war against Iraq and the current U.S. occupation in Iraq, as well as the issue of public support for private religious schools. Meanwhile, ex-Alliance leader Stockwell Day and Mike Harris and Ernie Eves' Tory government in Ontario get almost nothing but praise.



Jewish conservatives have made a big effort to get the Jewish community to shed its progressive heritage and become conservatives. This hasn't occurred.

Is Layton right about a "warming"? I'm not sure, but I think it is likely, with the rightward drift of the Liberals (with Paul Martin's leadership seemingly inevitable), that pro-Israel progressive Jews will continue to hold their noses and vote Liberal.

Beth Shalom in Ottawa

When we learned that the Beth Shalom Synagogue in Ottawa was moving from the Orthodox movement to join the Union for Traditional Judaism, we were both flattered and baffled.

Flattered, because we believe our message of open-minded halachic observance is compelling and attractive to Jews of all ages and backgrounds.

Baffled, because we were never notified by the shul nor did we approve Beth Shalom's new affiliation. To date, we have not received a formal application from the synagogue. There have been only a few telephone conversations with a shul representative. Were Beth Shalom to formally apply to join the UTJ, we would require a visit from a UTJ representative to both the executive board and the congregation, and that the congregation understand the UTJ's theological philosophy (hashkafah) and review our literature.

The UTJ promotes increased commitment to tradition, not the dismissal of age-old customs. While we embrace shuls with and without mechitzahs (and some with both mixed and separate seating in the same sanctuary), we fear that Beth Shalom's steps to remove its mechitzah and permit women to chant the haftorah may not be steps toward tradition, but simply attempts to attract membership. We certainly favour boosting shul attendance, but not in ways that steer toward egalitarian services.

We welcome communication with Beth Shalom and look forward to sharing with them our outlook on shul-building. But it would be regrettable if shul members based their recent vote on a false premise.

Re: Send Queen's Park a message

Regarding Mark Greenberg's letter, "Send Queen's Park a message," I agree that as Ontarians, we need to send a message to Queen's Park (Letters, CJN, May 29). However, my personal experiences this year lead me to question what seems to be the official "Jewish position" on the upcoming (I hope) provincial election.

As a high school student, I can understand the desire for a private school tax credit. But that doesn't make it justifiable. For Catholic schools to be funded and for other religious schools not to be is discrimination. I think that a sensible solution would be to stop funding Catholic schools. There should be no public funding of religion in the first place. Of course, this would mean parents who choose to send their children to private schools would have to pay more. That's too bad, but it is a choice to send a child to a private school. Many parents who send their children to public schools have no choice – they simply cannot afford private school, even with a tax credit.

It is also important to remember that not all Jewish students attend private schools. Many, myself included, attend public schools that are literally falling apart thanks to years of Tory neglect. This year, my school, along with many others, lost our youth counsellor, a vital source of support for many students. I also have been sharing a math textbook with two other students this year. That is unacceptable. Before middle- and upper-class parents get tax credits for the mixing of religion and government, public schools must be properly funded.

When going to the polls, please remember Jewish students like me who are too young to vote. Think about the trade-off. Do you want a tax credit when it comes with a government that is destroying education, treating poor and homeless people inhumanely and using your tax dollars to show contempt for the people of Ontario and its democratic traditions? If the Tory government would spend less taxpayer money on clearly partisan ads and ridiculous photo-op stunts, maybe members of our community could get private education tax credits without public education being hurt.

The Secret of Kibbutz Hill: Unsung Heroes of Israel's War of Independence

By RUTH HEIGES
Israel Press Service

The mundane hill behind the high-tech industries of the Kiryat Weizmann Science Park in Rehovot generally attracts little attention, as eyes are involuntarily drawn to the towering particle reactor at the nearby Weizmann Institute of Science. Increasingly, however, both Israelis and visitors are discovering the heroic story of the "kibbutz that never was."

For decades, Kibbutz Hill was taken simply at face value. Only in 1985 was its secret declassified: for a critical three-year period (1945-1948), the most important function of this kibbutz had been to serve as a cover for an underground munitions factory known as the Ayalon Institute. Within the Haganah, the largest of the underground Jewish military organizations, the word "institute" was code for an armaments plant.

The same people who had the chutzpah to stamp USA on the hand grenades they manufactured for use in the War of Independence (short for Unser Shtickl Arbeit – Yiddish for "our little piece of work") also had the nerve to establish a bullet-manufacturing facility right under the noses of the British. And when asked the purpose of the stamped sheets of brass they were importing, they explained, "Why, for producing lipstick tubes, of course!"

For years prior to the war, Kibbutz Hill had been a training area for pioneers preparing to start their own kibbutzim. When the Haganah decided it needed a facility for manufacturing nine-millimetre bullets for its Sten guns, the idea was born to create a secret plant under Kibbutz Hill. For cover, a functioning kibbutz was quickly put in place, complete with members, livestock, crops – and an industrial laundry and commercial bakery. The laundry even served the nearby British camp, and the bakery provided the camp with bread. But their real purpose was to camouflage access to the bullet factory located 12 feet below and provide ventilation for it (the chimneys of the bakery's furnace were used for injecting clean air and the chimneys of the laundry were used to pump out the polluted air) and make sufficient noise to obscure any sounds that might emanate from it.

Other ruses contributed to the subterfuge, some of them extremely simple, such as a sign at the entrance warning about the presence of hoof-and-mouth disease. The time it took for an unwanted visitor to disinfect his shoes in a chemical footbath was sufficient for sending a warning signal to the plant.

Yosef Blitt, one of the bakers, recalls one occasion when British soldiers came to search for illegal weapons.

"We kept beer on hand especially for them," he says. "Since we didn't drink it, it was always warm. When one of the officers jokingly complained about this, the 'kibbutz' secretary replied, 'We never know when you're coming. If you let us know in advance, we'll chill it for you.' From that day on, we always had enough advance notice of an inspection that we could hide anything suspicious in plenty of time."

The oven under which the stairway to the factory was hidden.

The secret facility, which measured 26x107 feet (8x33 metres) and was covered by 13 feet (4 metres) of earth, operated without detection from 1945 until the outbreak of the War of Independence and through 1948, keeping the Sten guns firing. In fact, such was the extent of the subterfuge that the majority of members believed that Kibbutz Hill was a genuine kibbutz and had no idea that 45 of their number were engaged in this project.

'We led a double life'

The building and operation of the "institute" was a co-operative effort by members of Hatzofim Aleph (a pioneer group) and people from Ta'as, the clandestine military industry. At a later stage, they were joined by Palmach (Assault Companies) trainees from two additional pioneer groups.

Tzippi Dagan was one of three Palmach members enlisted to persuade another 36 of her unit to come to Kibbutz Hill, without revealing the real reason. One of those was her then-boyfriend and future husband, Mati. She was immediately assigned to the munitions factory, but couldn't tell Mati, who was recuperating from a serious illness. When asked what her work assignments was, she would say, "Outside the fence," in the various agricultural areas, as she knew he was too weak to visit her.

On a number of occasions, though, he noticed gold-coloured residue in her hair or on her clothes and asked where she'd been working.

"Each time I told him I'd been in the orchards spraying trees, or spraying pesticides in the vegetable fields or orange groves. Finally, however, she went to the work foreman and said, "I've run out of agriculture stories. I must tell Mati something."

At about the same time, Mati announced, "Tzipke, I'm tired of sitting in my room and reading. I'm going to work in the orchard tomorrow."

Tzippi answered that she would be working in the vegetable fields the next day. It was only when they bumped into each other in the laundry, waiting to go downstairs into the munitions factory that they realized one another's true work assignment.

To help maintain the deception, workers spent hours under sun lamps, so as not to look suspiciously pale. They also received medical supervision and specially supplemented diets to compensate for not being in the sun.

"We led a double life – one above ground, one below. If we'd been found out, we would certainly have been killed," Tzippi says.

After the War of Independence, the inhabitants of Kibbutz Hill moved away and began to build new lives. The Ta'as Defence Industry unit largely continued to work in the new state's defence industries. The largest group, Tzofim Alef, went on to found Kibbutz Ma'agan Michael with some of the members of the Palmach group, such as Tzippi and Mati. And the members of the fourth group, a small number of Hechalutz (pioneer) members from England helped found Kibbutz Kfar Hanassi. But even separated, they remained united in one aspect: all kept the secret of Kibbutz Hill for close to four decades.

Some claim that not even then-Israeli prime minister David Ben-Gurion knew of the institute's operation, but that he ordered the site preserved once he eventually learned of it. In 1987, two years after the secret was finally declassified and following a refurbishment project, Kibbutz Hill was declared a national site and the Ayalon Institute Museum opened.

Tzippi says, "When we arrived at the ceremony after almost 40 years, one of the Palmach guys called me over and said, 'Tzipke, tell me, do you think that when we were here in 1947 the munitions factory existed?' He still had not made the connection, or realized that I had been one of those who had worked underground."

Mati and Tzippi had also not yet revealed their secret to their sons.

"Apart from the fact that we believed the story still to be classified, we were embarrassed and ashamed to have been in the Palmach and not been fighters on the battlefield," she says.

Today, Tzippi, who has retired from teaching and has been widowed for 12 years, has taken on documenting the experience of Kibbutz Hill and lecturing on the subject to soldiers.

Blitt, a recent widower, frequently visits Kibbutz Hill, occasionally conducting tours. "I always spend Independence Day there," he says. "It restores me."

A year and a half ago, Blitt received a call from one of the young guides at the Ayalon Institute, asking if he could come out to meet someone. It turned out to be the former commander of the British camp that had been located at the train station. "Someone told me about this place," the man explained, "and I just had to come and see how the Jews had fooled us."

Thinking of parents

For many of us, this is a time of year when we think of our parents more than we normally do. On Shavuot, we re-read the Ten Commandments, in which, of course, the fifth commandment relates directly to one's parents. Many of us say the Yizkor prayer in our parents' memory. In our secular lives, we have just celebrated Father's Day. Last month, we celebrated Mother's Day.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

My thoughts too turn to my parents.

My late mother (ale'ah hashalom) was the most effective teacher I ever had. Possessed of a powerful will, she could do what others might not dare to tackle. "If you will it, you'll be able to achieve your goal," she would say, and prove it with her own life.

I am proud to say that I was her number 1 pupil, and I will always remember her number 1 teaching: "The most important thing in life is to show up. If you're not present, people will forget you." That wise observation has guided me for many decades.

Mother died in the spring of 1993. But even though she left this earth a decade ago, she remains very much alive for me.

When she left us at 103 years of age, she was still a student at the University of Toronto, for learning was a very special love of her life. Born and raised in Germany, she always hoped to follow the example of her sister, Alice, who in the early 1920s entered university and obtained her PhD, something that very few women in Germany had done before her. Though Mother never obtained an advanced degree, the university became her home away from home.

Her example inspired many other elders, and thus she became a truly effective teacher.

To my late Dad (alav hashalom), I owe my intellectual interests. Jonas Plaut had the air of a successful businessman and could have been one, but chose instead to be a teacher. For many years after World War I, his former students told me about his marvelous skills. He was a purveyor of ideas that stimulated the mind.

Shortly after his arrival in Munster, Germany, in 1910, he met a young lady who was taking her sister to the elementary school affiliated with the town's seminary.

That young woman was Selma Gumprich. Jonas and Selma married a year later, in 1911.

The fifth commandment to honour our parents is meant to be fulfilled for as long as we live, not only for as long as our parents live. Thus, even though my parents are no longer alive, my memories of them are, especially so at this time of year.

Stories we need to tell

Recently I had the pleasure of witnessing a poignant reunion during a presentation at our local Jewish centre.

The reunion wasn't between two family members, but rather between a brother and his sister's suitcase – a suitcase that had been recovered from a concentration camp where she was killed on her very first day there in 1944.

Barbara Balfour in Calgary

Hana Brady was only 13 when she was sent to her death in Auschwitz's gas chambers. The suitcase she had once dutifully packed to take with her on a voyage that no one thought would be so short was miraculously recovered by a Japanese woman at the Holocaust centre in Tokyo.

She set out on a quest that spanned the globe to track down any living relatives who could fill in the gaps of Hana's story. She found her brother, George, who now lives in Toronto and is nearing his mid-seventies.

Both of them spoke last month in Calgary. As an audience member, I found myself particularly impressed by George's sense of humour when he spoke about trying to "make it" in Canada as a Holocaust survivor.

He talked about applying for a job at a Simpson's department store and writing on his application form that he had previously been at Auschwitz. An overzealous sales clerk filled in the blank space he had left under "reason for leaving" with "Left Auschwitz for a better position."

He also joked about marrying a doctor so she could take care of him in his old age, only to find out she was a gynecologist.

But most importantly, he talked about what finding his sister's suitcase meant to him.

It's these kind of unique family stories, artifacts and legends that are not only incredibly fascinating, they're integral to the fabric of our beings.

When you come together like that in a room full of people, many of whom have felt the pain of persecution at some point in their lives, you instantly feel like part of a unit, and you know that everyone there has a story that is in some way similar to yours.

I thought back to my own stories, passed down from generation to another, that I keep inside my head to tell my own children one day.

My great-grandfather was notorious in his small Russian village for being a clairvoyant psychic whom local townspeople would often consult for advice.

Yet, he was staggeringly clueless when it came to predicting his own future. He had fought alongside the Germans in World War I and refused to believe that they could cause him any harm when World War II rolled around.

When my great-grandmother finally gathered up her children and fled the village for safety, he stubbornly remained behind, only to be captured by the Nazis and forced to dig his own grave.

My grandmother also tells stories of hiding in the depths of the forest, of foraging for food, of a sister who died of pneumonia due to lack of adequate nourishment.

Recently a friend of mine who dabbles in black and white photography gave me a framed portrait of myself for my birthday. My mother saw it and remarked on how closely I resemble my grandmother in it – a testament to the power of genetics, I suppose.

I find these stories take on an especially surreal quality when they force me to break away from the daily monotony of life and work.

This week, I started a new job in Calgary's downtown oil and gas sector, and I have found it frighteningly easy to blend in as just another face in a sea of conservative business suits.

Among the people crammed into tiny elevators, all of us staring at the same tiny television screen in the corner until it's time to get off, it can be so easy to forget who you are and where you've come from – and what makes you unique.

But it's presentations like the one I attended last month that hit you the hardest.

Sometimes we forget what a small world we really live in.

Israel: a place to get a permanent smile

It's difficult to reconcile having so much to say with knowing that no words can adequately express all that needs to be said. I have been in Jerusalem for more than a month now, and I am still overwhelmed.

My experience began on a Canada Israel Experience Birthright trip. With 80 peers from across the country, I was given the gift of a lifetime. Each day my eyes were opened to new sights, my mind to history and culture brought to life in the the most tangible of ways. From north to south, east to west, we experienced our homeland.

Joanna Grossman in Halifax

Part of the Birthright program includes a "mifgash," an encounter between trip participants and Israel Defence Force soldiers. We had the opportunity to travel with and get to know young men and women our age who are protecting the land we call home. In one of our more memorable conversations, they expressed their amazement and support to us for coming to visit Israel. We stood in utter amazement, wondering how they could be inspired when at the end of our simple journey we would return safely to Canada while they returned to an army base.

Over the course of my 10 days on Birthright, I watched the hearts of my friends open up to a country they had once known so little about, but where they now feel truly at home. It is only once you are here that the images we see in the media dissolve, leaving a country of wonder and amazement.

During my free time in Jerusalem, I met students participating on another trip coordinated through Canada Israel Experience. On it, university students from Toronto were exposed to all sides of the Israeli political spectrum as they listened to speakers and travelled throughout the land.

Journeying with them to Gush Etzion, a West Bank community beyond the Green Line, we came to understand stories that don't play well in the media. We saw a beautiful and thriving community with roots that precede Israel's own history as a state. We realized that politics makes us forget about people, and that conflict distracts us from seeing the bigger picture.

Speaking with my fellow trip participants, it became clear many of us are searching for the same things. We all feel a passion for Israel but find ourselves unable to communicate something without having experienced it personally. Coming to Israel, we have been given the opportunity to meet people, see the land and the politics with our own eyes and thus gain an affirmation of our beliefs that we can bring back to our campuses.

Ultimately, though, what I most appreciate about my time here in Israel is that when you are here, you are simply here, living life. Walking down the street, you realize that every person you pass shares a common past, present and future. Even the pushiness and rudeness that is part of the stereotypical sabra attitude can be appreciated while you are here. Indeed, there is something about this place that leaves me with a permanent smile on my face.

I have been living in Jerusalem, where nothing is ordinary. The air here just feels a little different – it has a taste like no other. The holy city we flocked to in the days of the temples still stands as a testament to all that we have strived for – and will continue to strive for.

Celebrating Shavuot and seeing the streets filled with people throughout the night walking from shiur to shiur, ending in shacharit prayers at the Kotel, one can't help but realize the significance of what exists here.

The very concept of a Jewish state is now more profound for me. To see a society functioning under the precepts of a faith, culture and tradition so rich in ideology and objectives demonstrates the potential and strength of the nation and people we are all a part of, no matter where we live.

I have been intoxicated by my stay in Israel. I have found a capacity for thought and exploration that didn't exist for me in Canada. There are so many other experiences I could convey, so many thoughts to explore, but leaving aside the specifics, what I appreciate most is that I have been able to find myself at home.

U.S. struggles with chaos and violence in Iraq

Three months to the day after American and allied armies stormed into Iraq in Operation Iraqi Freedom, Iraq wallows in a welter of disorder.

As it slowly emerges from the tyranny of Saddam Hussein's Baathist dictatorship, Iraq struggles with chaos, lawlessness and violence and copes with an abysmal lack of essential services.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

It is clear that the reconstruction and democratization of Iraq will take considerably longer than the United States had anticipated.

Cognizant of this, U.S. Secretary of Defence Donald Rumsfeld has pledged to keep as many troops in Iraq as necessary.

There are 160,000 American and British soldiers in Iraq today, but many more will be needed to maintain order. Prior to the invasion, the U.S. army chief of staff, Gen. Eric Shinseki, predicted that hundreds of troops would be required to secure Iraq.

The United States is enforcing its occupation through a carrot-and-stick policy designed to win hearts and minds and root out remnants of the old regime.

But for now, Iraq is mired in instability and uncertainty – so much so that when U.S. President George W. Bush visited the Middle East earlier this month, he did not even set foot in Iraq.

Bowing to sober advice, he chose to view Iraq from the safety of his airplane, at an altitude of some 31,000 feet, knowing full well that U.S. troops are under fire along its length and breadth.

Contrary to expectations, the United States emerged relatively unscathed from the three-week war. From March 19, the launch date of the invasion, until May 1, the day Bush declared an end to hostilities, 139 U.S. soldiers were killed in Iraq. (During the first Gulf War in 1991, the U.S. death toll was 148.)

But since the official cessation of the second Gulf War, more than 40 American soldiers have been killed in fighting and accidents.

Virtually every day, Iraqi gunmen attack U.S. patrols, convoys, checkpoints and garrisons with assault rifles, mortars and rocket-propelled grenades.

These attacks – which bear an uncanny resemblance to those mounted by Hezbollah against Israel in southern Lebanon from 1983 to 2000 – make one wonder whether a general uprising is brewing. The last such uprising broke out in 1920, when Britain occupied Iraq.

In the current situation, almost all the attacks have occured in central Iraq, a predominantly Sunni Muslim area where Saddam, a Sunni, enjoyed strong support.

Not surprisingly, American officials believe that hardcore Saddam loyalists are behind the majority of assaults, the flashpoints of which have been Baghdad and Fallujah. But Islamic fundamentalists and foreign Arabs may also be involved.

Until last week, the United States believed that these attacks were not centrally planned. But on June 9, Rumsfeld speculated that they may be the result of an organized guerrilla offensive led by Baath party members.

Interestingly enough, Rumsfeld admitted that the failure to apprehend Saddam – who may or may not have been killed in the war – has galvanized Baathists into thinking their cause is not yet lost.

For a brief moment after the war, the United States seemed resigned to the presence of hundreds of Baath party members in high-ranking ministerial posts.

But on May 11, in a bold swing toward de-Baathification, the commander of U.S. forces in Iraq, Gen. Tommy Franks, abolished the Baath party, which first seized power in 1963 and again in 1968, and removed dozens of Baathists from government ministries.

On May 16, the new American civilian administrator in Iraq, Paul Bremer, announced that 15,000 to 30,000 Baath party diehards would be barred from public service jobs.

Baathists are far from being the only opposition force the United States faces in Iraq, which is populated mainly by Shiite Muslims.

Since the fall of Baghdad on April 9, pro-Iranian Shiite clerics who dream of an Islamic state have rushed in to try to fill the vacuum caused by Saddam's demise. Rumsfeld has warned Iran that attempts to "transform Iraq in Iran's image" will not be tolerated. But significantly, the United States has no objection to an "Islamic democracy" modelled after Turkey.

In the meantime, Washington is working day and night to win over the Shiites, who were oppressed by Saddam. But the road the United States has embarked upon will be long and bumpy.

Consider a few recent developments.

On May 10, a pro-U.S. Shiite cleric, Abdul Majid al-Khoei, was murdered in a mosque in Najaf. Since his assassination, a flurry of important Shiite religious leaders, from Moktada al-Sadr to Muhammed al-Hakim, have explicitly called for a state governed by the principles of Islam and for the ouster of "infidels" from Iraq.

Still other imams have expressed more radical views.

Donald Rumsfeld

At Friday prayers on June 6, in one of Baghdad's largest mosques, an imam named Mouaid al-Abaidi described the recent spate of attacks targeting American soldiers as heroic acts of self-defence and urged his listeners to wage a jihad against U.S. forces.

On May 19, in yet another sign of Iraqi dissatisfaction with the occupation, 10,000 Shiites gathered in the centre of Baghdad chanting, "No to the foreign administration."

The United States clearly wishes to build the foundations of a broad-based representative government in Iraq, which has been accustomed to harsh military rule since its independence in 1932. But given the current turmoil roiling Iraq, the flowering of Iraqi democracy is far off.

Originally, Washington intended to convene a conference of about 300 Iraqis to draft a new constitution and elect an interim homegrown government.

But in a major shift that has greatly upset pro-American Iraqi exiles such as Ahmad Chalabi, president of the Iraqi National Congress, the United States has instead chosen to allow an Iraqi group to advise Bremer. He is a tough, no-nonsense administrator who succeeded the hapless Jay Garner, a retired general who ran the relief effort in northern Iraq following the first Gulf War.

Before democracy can take root in an ethically divisive nation such as Iraq, law and order and basic services will have to be completely restored.

In the days after American Marines captured Baghdad, toppling grandiose statues of Saddam and asserting their authority by the force of arms, there was a catastrophic breakdown of municipal services throughout Iraq and, most noteworthy, in Baghdad.

With the ferociously hot summer weather fast approaching, electricity and clean running water were in short supply, and telephones and sewage treatment plants did not work.

Worse still, Iraqi towns and cities were subjected to a wave of looting, armed robberies, car-jackings and revenge killings.

Intimidated by the anarchy, merchants closed their shops, traders stopped doing business and managers of state-owned companies shut their doors. Aggravated by 12 years of United Nations economic sanctions, unemployment climbed sharply, further impoverishing the Iraqi people. The situation has since improved, but Iraq is still very much of a broken country.

During the chaotic period immediately after the war, the National Museum in Baghdad – an unsurpassed repository of archeological treasures of ancient Mesopotamia – was plundered by ordinary citizens and professional thieves as U.S. soldiers stood by.

It now appears that the incalculable losses the museum incurred were exaggerated. Nevertheless, many pieces, from inscribed tablets to gold jewelry, are still unaccounted for and may have been bought by unscrupulous antiquity dealers.

At the urging of the United States and Britain, the United Nations on May 22 lifted the sanctions and legitimized the occupation of Iraq. Iraq is now free to resume unfettered oil exports, the revenue from which will contribute immensely to Iraq's reconstruction.

At its peak, Iraq produced about 3.5 million barrels of oil a day. After the resumption of Iraqi oil exports in 1996, the figure rose to two million barrels. Last month, Iraqi oil fields were only producing 300,000 barrels per day. By the summer, production may reach a million barrels a day.

By any yardstick, Iraq, with its plentiful oil and water reserves, its agricultural lands, its industrial base and its educated population, has the potential to become one of the most prosperous nations in the Arab world.

But if the United States fails to restore order and revive the economy, Iraq will descend into a sinkhole of despair, with all its terrible consequences.

Rabbis split over legalization of same-sex marriage

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Reactions were mixed in Jewish circles to last week's landmark Ontario Court of Appeal ruling that legalized same-sex marriage in the province.

"It's a wonderful move," enthused Rabbi Debra Landsberg, incoming chair of the Canadian Coalition of Liberal Rabbis for Same-Sex Marriage.

"As someone who entered Canada [from the U.S.] having already officiated at a gay marriage ceremony, I believe in the sanctity of marriage as something distinct from an ongoing, long-term relationship," said Rabbi Landsberg, spiritual leader of Toronto's Temple Emanu-El.

The coalition, comprised of 25 Reform and Reconstructionist rabbis across Canada, presented a 21-page factum to the court in support of same-sex marriage, arguing that homosexual couples are just as capable of fulfilling Jewish values as heterosexual ones, and that Jewish law in this area is "not immutable."

Ed Morgan, the rabbis' lawyer, called the ruling a "resounding defeat" for the federal government, but one that "was only a matter of time."

The June 10 ruling rewrote the definition of marriage to include same-sex couples, saying denying gays and lesbians the right to marry offends their dignity, discriminates on the basis of sexual orientation and violates their equality rights under the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

The historic, unanimous judgment makes same-sex marriages legal for the first time in Canada.

Courts in British Columbia and Quebec have also struck down marriage laws, but gave governments until next year to rewrite their legislation.

The Ontario judgment goes further because it ordered Toronto's city clerk and the provincial registrar-general to issue and accept marriage licences for two couples who wed in 2001 under the ancient Christian tradition of the publication of banns. That allowed them to avoid having to get city-issued licenses.

The court rejected the fear of religious groups that gay marriage infringes on religious freedom because it would force them to conduct ceremonies against their will.

"This case is about the legal institution of marriage," the court said. "We do not view this case as, in any way, dealing or interfering with the religious institution of marriage."

Rabbi Landsberg said same-sex marriage fits with her understanding "of the appropriate extension of what is understood as marriage in a Jewish sense." Halachah is open to "natural growth and development, just as the Jewish people are."

The court, ruling on an appeal of a lower court's finding that the traditional definition of marriage was unconstitutional, changed the definition of marriage from being "the voluntary union for life of one man and one woman," to "the voluntary union for life of two persons to the exclusion of all others."

Rabbi David Novak, professor of Jewish studies at the University of Toronto and a vocal opponent of same-sex unions, sees the ruling as harming the traditional definition of marriage.

"It's unfortunate this type of decision makes the institution of marriage virtually meaningless," said Rabbi Novak, who told the House of Commons committee studying same-sex unions this spring that Judaism regards marriage as the union of a man and a woman and is driven by the biblical commandment to "be fruitful and multiply."

He said the court ruling opens the door to other unions: "Polygamy... incest. Why just two human beings?"

He challenged liberal rabbis "to show me one classical Jewish source to show what they are advocating is justified."

Apart from altering the definition of marriage, Rabbi Novak foresees other problems in the Jewish community, including opening synagogues to discrimination if they refuse to perform same-sex weddings.

Also, "what if one [partner in a same-sex marriage] applies to be a teacher in a Jewish school? What about synagogue membership for couples?

"I don't think gays will stop. I think their aim is to totally, completely transform the moral tone of society."

He also called on Orthodox and traditional religious leaders to speak up more on this and other issues.

"People looking on get a very skewed view of Judaism when they see 25 liberal rabbis supporting same-sex marriage" without a countervailing Orthodox view, he said.

Morgan, the lawyer who represented the liberal rabbis before the Court of Appeal, said in his capacity as chair of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, that he recognizes there is a diversity of views among Jews on this issue.

"I think that's mirrored in the community at large," he said.

As of last week, there seemed to be no rush among Jewish same-sex couples to seek a marriage license.

Last summer, Rabbi Justin Lewis of Kingston officiated at the wedding of two Jewish women in Toronto. Rabbi Lewis, spiritual leader of the Reform Congregation Iyr Ha-Melech, described it as a complete Jewish ceremony, with a chupah, ketubah, witnesses, proper brachot and an exchange of rings – "the whole works" – although it wasn't in a synagogue.

But when he tried to have the marriage registered by the province, "I received a telephone call threatening to revoke my right to officiate at weddings if I continued to do same-sex marriages.

"I hope that's changed now."

Rabbi Dovid Schochet, head of Toronto's Vaad Harabanim, did not not mince words in his reaction to the court ruling.

"It's a chillul Hashem, a desecration of God's name and law. It's not a matter of broad-mindedness. It's very simple. Sodomy is not only a Jewish matter, but it's forbidden by the [seven] Noachide Laws, which apply to everybody."

Israel Day festival 'brings people together'

By LAUREN KRUGEL
CJN Intern

A mass of people clad in blue and white filled Mel Lastman Square recently to celebrate Israel Day – a festival showcasing Israeli food, music, dance, and art.

The eighth annual non-profit event, held June 8, was organized by the Canadian Zionist Federation (CZF).

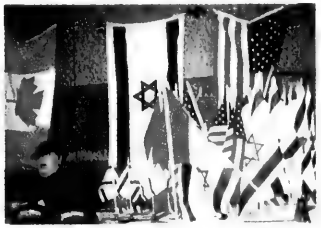
"It's good for the community… It brings people together," said Tillie Margolis, festival chair and president of the central chapter of the CZF.

Margolis said the current situation in the Middle East is "all the more reason" to have such an event. "It shows people Israel is a wonderful country."

Shlomo Lazar, a student at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, wore an Israeli flag as a cape as he enjoyed the festival's sights and sounds.

"Although [the festival] shows what Israel is going through so people will understand, it helps people be happy and think of [its] good side," he said.

A chain of vendors along the rim of the square sold a variety of Israeli products to support the country's ailing economy. Festival-goers could buy items ranging from eclectic jewelry to flower arrangements to beauty products.



Howard Rosenberg said his family's business in Israel is suffering from the country's ongoing economic slump. This is why his relatives have sent him their educational toys to sell in Canada.

"They need the help," he said, standing in front of a colourful stack of toy boxes.

Anna Hayek Kanpol imports jewelry from seven Israeli designers. Being from Israel herself, "I feel like it's my small contribution," she said as she displayed a red coral pendant designed in Tel Aviv.

She said the flowers are not unique to Israel and Canadians can buy the same flowers that come from other countries.

But she said her flowers, which she sells for Shabbat and special events such as bar mitzvahs and weddings, "symbolize something and bring some meaning to Jewish events… it's something alive that comes from Israel."

Other Israeli products for sale included Naot sandals, T-shirts, silverware and wooden mezuzot.

"The vendors added to the flavour," Margolis said.

Joseph Fox, co-chair of the Buy Israel program – sponsored by UJA Federation and the Israeli consulate – that encourages Jews to buy Israeli products, said Jews should aim to spend at least 20 per cent of their budget on Israeli-made items to support the country.

"You can't have a strong country militarily and diplomatically unless you have a strong economy," he said.

Buy Israel publishes a list of stores that carry Israeli products and where to find them, which Fox distributed at the festival.

The day also included entertainment by Israeli dancers, school choirs, magicians and rock bands.

Due to the rise in anti-Semitic incidents in Canada over the last 2½ years, the organizers had security on their minds, Margolis said.

Although the CZF could not afford to hire police to patrol the square, a few officers kept an eye on the surrounding neighbourhoods, she said.

As well, retired Toronto firefighters in uniform and plain-clothes volunteers from Shomrim, a New York City-based Jewish police association, helped to keep the square safe.

"We were very lucky nothing happened… We were concerned about that," Margolis said.

Institutional, personal responses to uncertainty

Four Hundred Brothers and Sisters: The story of two Jewish orphanages in Montreal, Quebec, 1909-1942*, by Judy Gordon, Lugus Publishing, $25.

Books
Bernard Baskin

Between 1909 and 1942, in a time of war and difficulty, two Jewish orphanages flourished in Montreal – the Hebrew Orphan's Home in Westmount and the Montefiore Hebrew Orphan's Home in the city's north end. These institutions were created so that poor Jewish children and orphans were not placed in Christian facilities to receive shelter and education.

The orphanages were largely unknown, even to longtime members of the Jewish community. The author, married to a former resident in one of the homes, has done an impressive amount of research for her absorbing and often entertaining account of bygone days when, in the 1930s, bagels cost one cent and a man's suit could be purchased for $9.99.

In his forward to the book, well-known Canadian author Morley Torgov writes that the colourful biographies of former residents "stem from firsthand knowledge and experience, and offer unadorned, straightforward and honest remembrances, enhanced by reproduced documents and photographs that tell all the truth one could wish for. The stories are at once touching, sad, joyful and above all, life-affirming."

A brief but lively history of Montreal from 1900 to 1940 contains fascinating information. We learn about the infamous Montreal interns' strike, one of the hundreds of anti-Semitic incidents that occurred between the two world wars. Samuel Rabinovich was a young medical student who came first in his class at the University of Montreal.

"As he started his internship at Notre Dame Hospital, all 14 of his fellow interns walked out, refusing to work with a Jew, concerned that their Catholic patients would find it 'repugnant' to be touched by a Jewish physician. He resigned. It took until 1945 before restrictions were lifted."

This largely sociological work provides ample lists of tables and figures, including the names of those who attended the Sunshine Camp in the Laurentians and their joyful annual reunions. There is plenty here to interest anyone curious about a unique chapter in Canadian-Jewish life during a period of change and painful acculturation.

Charach is a practising Toronto psychiatrist as well as a poet (this is his seventh published book of poetry). Fearful and troubled, he searches for meaning in a world of ambiguity and uncertainty.

In Jewish Earthquake, he recalls the collapse of the wedding hall in Jerusalem in May 2001. "Beneath the dancing feet of a hundred wedding revellers/ the floor opens up, and with terrified screams/ three stories collapse into one/ captured in what the TV announcer later names/ the most horrific wedding video ever made./ Twenty-five crushed to death, scores more injured./ (a fateful choice among banquet halls for a simchah,/ a contractor who removed a support beam/to open more commercial space?)"

In The Night After, he writes of a foiled plot to dynamite a daycare centre. The poem concludes, "Like benediction, relief comes/ only from immersion in sleep/ and in earth yet unclaimed/ by a long-forgotten dream of peace,/ a peace that stretches not just from Cairo to Amman/ but Baghdad to Riyadh, Beirut to Damascus/ – to Jerusalem! – / all the sacred incendiary points between/ Salaam and Shalom."

The Old Cardiology Dream is humorous with a hint of terror. "Last night I had/the old cardiology dream,/ of a baby born with six hearts./ So many valves that could falter!/ And how rare,/the necessary synchrony./ Baby, I will cherish you,/ one-man percussion band that you are,/ and devote my life/ to seeing yours through./ May none of your frail pink hearts/break mine."

Charach's is a sensitive voice, attuned to the storms and stresses of our age.

Discoveries large and small

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

After the death of her mother about a decade ago, Toronto resident Judi Ghert found that she left behind "a treasure trove" of diaries, photographs and letters, most pertaining to a trip she'd taken from the United States to Palestine in 1935.

Roots & Remembrance

Ghert used the return addresses on the envelopes to track down some long-lost relatives, including one who showed her an ancestral chart going back to 1810. Her own great-grandfather, she learned, was named Joseph Kossowsky.

These spectacular results were only the beginning for Ghert, who by then was fully bitten by the genealogy bug.

Attending a genealogy conference in Boston, she was amazed to discover that an Israeli researcher, Chaim Freedman, was seeking information on her great-grandfather and his descendents. Kossowsky, it turned out, had been descended from the Vilna Gaon, the illustrious 18th-century Lithuanian rabbi.

Ghert contacted Freedman and he added her previously missing branch onto the tree, which was published in 1997 as Eliyahu's Branches: The Descendants of the Vilna Gaon and His Family.

"It was the shock of my life to discover that my great-grandfather was the sixth missing sibling that he had been looking for," said Ghert, who could suddenly lay claim to a distinguished rabbinical lineage and a family tree of more than 20,000 names.

"Everything I did snowballed. It just kept getting bigger and bigger. Suddenly I discovered I have a fantastically huge family all over the place, in South Africa, Europe, England, Israel, the United States. It's absolutely mind-boggling."

The Vilna Gaon "was my great-great-great-great-great-grandfather," she said. "I have to refresh my memory how many generations it goes back. I'm a direct descendant through his son, Yehuda Leib."

* * *

Often, a series of small discoveries may lead up to the sort of colossal breakthrough described above. However, even small discoveries can be fascinating in themselves.

Over the years I've tracked down the descendants of the various siblings of my great-grandfather, Tsvi Hirsh Glicenstein, but I had no luck for his brother, Faybus Ber, born in Konin, Poland, in 1866.

Faybus (Feivel) Ber came to England with his widowed mother and siblings in the late 1880s, and appeared in the 1891 census as Barnett Gluckstein. An 1899 birth certificate indicated that his wife was Esther and their newborn son was Raphael. That was all I knew about him – until last month, when I spotted a tragic reference to Raphael on JewishGen's Internet discussion group for U.K. researchers.

London researcher Harold Pollins had been investigating some extremely young British-Jewish casualties in World War I, including a 15-year-old soldier killed in Belgium in 1914. He was identified on the Commonwealth War Graves Commission Web site as Robert Barnett, aka Raphael Gluckstein, the son of Philip and Esther of Stoke Newington, London.

Since Philip is the usual English translation of Feivel or Feivish, I knew almost immediately that I had found my grandfather's first cousin. His death sparked questions in the British press as to why children were being sent into battle.

Another youngster joined the Canadian army to fight for Britain in World War I. According to his attestation papers (accessible via the National Archives Web site, www.archives.ca), Welsh-born Reuben Ginsberg of Montreal was only four feet eight inches tall when he enlisted at the age of 14.

Wounded in France at 15, Ginsberg was recuperating in hospital when a Jewish chaplain discovered him and arranged for him to have a bar mitzvah. One hopes the chaplain also found some way of keeping him from returning to the front.

Jewish Life

Pirates, rabbis and Jewish history

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

After the destruction of the Temple and the commonwealth 1,935 years ago, the epicentre of Jewish life shifted to Babylonia (modern-day Iraq). There, communities flourished and academies were established that grew and produced major scholars and scholarship.

What caused the centre of Torah learning to move on to its next stop in the Iberian Peninsula is one of history's most curious incidents.

Roughly, it occurred just prior to the end of the first millennium. A band of pirates from the province of Cordovia in Spain, who set their eyes and their sails to sea, soon found just what they had gone looking for: an undefended ship.

But in its cargo hold, there were none of the treasures they had envisioned. Instead, they found it was mostly full of merchants. Among them, however, they also found four great Babylonian scholars on a mission to raise funds. This, the pirates understood, was far more precious than any treasure, not because of their love of knowledge, but because they understood that these rabbis represented lucrative ransom possibilities.

The rabbis on board were Rabbi Chushiel, son of Chananel; Rabban Moshe, father of Chanoch; Rabbi Shmaryahu, son of Elchonon; and a fourth whose name is lost in time.

First, Rabbi Shmaryahu was sold on the block in Alexandria, where the Jewish community raised the ransom in order to gain his freedom. In gratitude, Rabbi Shmaryahu remained in Alexandria and eventually headed the Jewish community there.

Similarly, Rabbi Chushiel was sold on the North African coast, where tremendous funds were set aside to gain his freedom. In gratitude, he too went on to build the centre in Kairouan.

Along with the pirates, Rabbi Moshe went to Cordovia where he sowed the seeds of the golden era of Spain that lasted more than 400 years and produced unparalleled accomplishments in the realms of Halachah, liturgy, poetry, mathematics and science.

Hence, in this ironic twist of fate, North Africa, Egypt and Spain were established as the new budding centres of the Torah world, centres that eventually surpassed Babylonia itself. Because of their proximity to one another, these new communities no longer felt the need to correspond with, nor to impose their requests on, the old centre in Babylonia. Nor did they see the need to continue supporting its academies. Jewish communities grew and prospered around the new centres until they totally supplanted those in Babylonia.

So, using a band of pirates, God's hand turned the page of history. The next page was turned in 1492 by again using a ship, this time that of Christopher Columbus on his fateful voyage that opened up "a new world" for the next stop in this movement.

The ironies and twists of history can only be understood and appreciated with the passage of much time. As a traveller in the Diaspora, one is resigned to having one's bags perpetually packed and ready to move on. Ever conscious of these geographic movements, at the same time one longs for the time that the next move will be the final and permanent one, led by the Mashiach into Eretz Yisrael.

The Ketubah and the Internet

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

It's not too often you find a legal document that is also a work of art illustrating love and commitment. The ketubah, the Jewish marriage contract, has for thousands of years detailed a husband's obligations to his wife during marriage and his responsibilities in the case of divorce. Beyond that, the ketubah has become a prized piece of Judaic art.

If it's time to choose the design for your own ketubah, then first of all, let me wish you mazel tov on your engagement! You can see the world's best ketubot right on your computer. And even if you're not getting married, you still can enjoy a tour of one of Judaism's most interesting and beautiful documents.

According to the Ohr Somayach site, "This contract is ordained by Mishnaic law (circa 170 CE) and according to some authorities dates back to biblical times. [It] details the husband's obligations to his wife: food, clothing, dwelling and pleasure. It also creates a lien on all his property to pay her a sum of money and support should he divorce her, or predecease her [http://www.ohr.org.il/judaism/articles/wedding.htm].

The traditional ketubah is written in Aramaic, the language of the Babylonian Jews. You can find an English translation at the Information Page on Jewish Family Law [http://users.aol.com/agunah/family.htm]. At the e-judaica Web site, you'll find an explanation of the ketubah variations available [http://store.yahoo.com/ejudaica/huppaketubah.html]. For example, the Conservative ketubah includes the "Lieberman Clause," which was added to allow either the man or the woman to initiate a divorce. The Web site points out that Orthodox rabbis do not recognize the Lieberman Clause and that you should check with your rabbi before selecting your text.

Most ketubot in recent centuries have conformed to a standardized text, but as Eliezer Segal points out, some ancient ketubot addressed the termination of the marriage at the initiative of the husband and even the wife. Here's an excerpt from the oldest existing ketubah, dating from the fifth century BCE and originating on the island of Elephantine in the Nile. "If at some time Ananiah should stand up before the assembly and declare, 'I reject my wife Jehoshama. She shall not be my wife!' then he is obligated to pay divorce money… And if Jehoshama should reject her husband Ananiah and declare before him, 'I reject you and will not be your wife!' then she shall be obliged to pay the divorce money" [http://www.ucalgary.ca/~elsegal/Shokel/950216_Ketubbah.html]. For more on the history of the ketubah, visit the entry at The Jewish Encyclopedia [http://www.jewishencyclopedia.com/view.jsp?artid=187&letter=K].

Although the ketubah is essentially a legal document, adorning this document is a cherished tradition. As Yale University's Beinecke Rare Book and Manuscript Library eloquently puts it: "These decorations transform the ketubah from a dry legal document into a work of art, and a window into the world and culture of the Jewish communities that produced them" [http://www.library.yale.edu/exhibition/judaica/brbml.html].

To browse or order contemporary ketubot by specific artists, visit the Maven wedding site [http://www.maven.co.il/subjects.asp?S=502&ID =1&T=0], or type the word "ketubah" into a search engine such as Google [http://google.com]. If you are looking for inspiration for your own ketubah or just love Judaic art, the best site to visit is the Ketubot Digitization Project of the Jewish National and University Library in Jerusalem, which has catalogued and made available on the web hundreds of ketubot from around the world [http://jnul.huji.ac.il/dl/ketubbot/]. The oldest ketubah on this site dates back to the year 1023 in Eretz Yisrael between the groom, Natan HaCohen HaTzefati ben Shlomo, and his bride, Rachel. For more about this incredible collection, see the article in Cultivate Interactive magazine [http://www.cultivate-int.org/issue4/ketubbot/].

Anita Diamant says you shouldn't just admire your ketubah once in a while after the wedding is over and it's hanging on your wall. Instead, she says, read it regularly: "[O]n every wedding anniversary, Jewish couples should sit down and read the contract they signed with stars in their eyes… Even the most exquisite ketubah is never simply a work of art. A ketubah always signifies the Jewishness of a love story, a marriage, a home, a family, a past and a future" [http://www.ujafederation.org/content_display.html?articleID =9356].

Next time, the beauty of the chupah.

Holocaust educator on scholarship in Poland

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Carson Phillips admits that some of the material he studies about the Holocaust gets him down, but he says he draws strength from the Holocaust survivors he knows.

Phillips, the co-ordinator of Holocaust and adult education for the Regional Jewish Communities of Ontario (RJCO) – a partnership between UIA Federations Canada and Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region – left for Poland June 15 on a scholarship awarded to only four people in North America. He is the sole Canadian.

A 39-year-old native of Grand Falls, Nfld. – a town of 10,000 – Phillips was working for Shiseido Canada as a national training manager when he was transferred to Toronto in 1995. He spent four years with the cosmetic company in marketing and public relations before taking on his current position last September.

Phillips, who is active in the First Narayever Congregation, has moved from working with beauty products to working with "incredibly beautiful people," he said. "It enriches my own life."

His duties include researching, developing and implementing province-wide Holocaust teacher training programs in 27 communities, including Ajax, North Bay and Sault Ste. Marie.

"We do a lot of travelling," he said, referring to himself, Michael Soberman (RJCO's director of community development) and the Holocaust survivors who have travelled with them to share their personal stories.

"It's a combination of outreach to non-Jewish organizations and school boards… and helping co-ordinate adult education within the Jewish community."

Phillips, who is completing a graduate diploma program at OISE, said he has always been interested in human rights and anti-racism. His volunteer efforts include work at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care and for an annual HIV/AIDS-related fundraiser.

Carson Phillips

His position at the RJCO was created in part because of requests from outside Toronto for pedagogical strategies for Holocaust education, Phillips said.

The scholarship, awarded by the Auschwitz Jewish Center Foundation in New York, will enable him to spend six weeks in Poland at Chevra Lomdei Mishnayot Synagogue and Auschwitz Jewish Centre, the only remaining synagogue in the town. He will work with tour groups as a docent and will be involved in one of the centre's research projects, possibly studying Jewish life in pre-war Poland or researching names of people killed in Auschwitz.

"It's something I've always wanted to do, to see not only the sites and the concentration camps, but to connect with the heritage and what was there before the Holocaust," he said.

The length of the stay was also particularly appealing to him. "You have that opportunity to absorb so much. It's not just in and out, so I think it's that length of time that [affords one] the opportunity to research and get beyond the layers."

When it comes to the Holocaust, "the more you study, the more you realize there is. It's like peeling the layers off an onion," he said, adding he "definitely" plans to incorporate what he learns into RJCO's teacher training program.

Ajax synagogue gets new Torah

By ELYSSE ZAREK
CJN Intern

AJAX, Ont. — In the eight years that B'nai Shalom V'Tikvah has been open, it hasn't had its own Torah, but after two years of searching, it finally brought one home.

More than 60 people danced, sang and passed the new Torah from one set of arms to another as the small synagogue in Ajax, an hour outside Toronto, celebrated the receiving of its own Torah on Shavuot two weeks ago.

"This was one of our most touching services," said Harvey Saltzman, who was the synagogue's founding president and now serves as its treasurer.

Current synagogue president Linda Zaks-Walker said the Torah sent a message to the community that they are here to stay.

"It's a major step for us," she said. "It's a real mark of permanence."

The quest for the Torah began with the establishment of the Lynne Reiss Sefer Torah fund. Reiss was a founding member and teacher at the synagogue's Sunday school who died in 1995, when the shul was still in its infancy.

Two years ago, the search resumed in earnest, said Saltzman. First the congregation tried to get a Torah through the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism (CCRJ), and then through the World Jewish Congress in New York. They also looked in London and Israel.

Meanwhile, the synagogue had been using a Torah on loan from the CCRJ.

But "it needed repairs," said Saltzman, "so we took it to a scribe." When he told the scribe about their troubles finding a Torah, "lo and behold, he pulled one out."

The new Torah is 25 years old and previously belonged to a congregation in Israel that had fallen on hard times.

B'nai Shalom V'Tikvah got its start in a recreation centre and now uses the facilities at St. Paul's United Church. Saltzman said the shul has a wonderful working relationship with St. Paul's.

"They're very accommodating… they let us set up a bimah in the main sanctuary in the way that we like."

B'nai Shalom V'Tikvah holds services twice a month from September to June, as well as for holidays.

It is the only Reform synagogue in the Durham region. It has a membership of over 50 families, many of which come from as far as Oshawa and Port Perry.

How to resolve high conflict cases in family law: a case study using Canada, Quebec, America and Iraq

Family Matters

by

John Syrtash, B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.
Partner, Beard Winter LLP

The first question many new clients ask me is: Are you tough? Yes, one of my tools is being firm and not "caving" into unreasonable demands of opposing counsel.

However, being tough is often the easy part. It is the art of skillful compromise and brinkmanship that requires a truly experienced family law lawyer.

To demonstrate, by analogy, how an experienced family law lawyer thinks and works when negotiating, I ask you to consider the current internal "family" divisions in Canada created by the Iraqi war.

Shalom Bais (peace in the family home) is a basic premise of Judaism. According to chazal (the Jewish sages), it is the reason why the Mezuza to be posted on the entrance of every Jewish home must be on an angle — not horizontal or vertical — so as to symbolize the need for compromise in every Jewish home and in every Jewish marriage. This compromise is a great virtue that often requires silent sacrifice.

The need to compromise is posted at your front door

When negotiating difficult separation agreements I am often hampered by people on both sides who cannot understand the need for compromise, the need to think about the long term. There is not a day in my practice or in the world at large that this issue does not rage. For this reason, the family law / foreign policy analogy is apt.

Many Canadians — mostly outside Quebec and especially in Canada's Western Provinces, with a slight majority in Ontario — were sympathetic to the American war against Saddam Hussein in Iraq, and critical of the Jean Chrétien government. They were critical of Canada's refusal — even without a further resolution from the U.N. — to join our American, Australian and Polish allies in that war, which they regarded as a war of liberation. Equally upset by Canada's refusal to turn over fleeing members of Hussein's regime to American forces, they were also outraged by the Prime Minister's silence and apparent refusal to censure certain Liberal MPs, including one Cabinet Minister who sharply criticized Americans ("bastards") and President Bush ("not a statesman.")

Conversely, polls suggested that about 85% of Quebeckers sharply opposed any involvement in the Iraqi war, even if the U.N. clearly authorized such a war. By far the largest street demonstrations against the war took place in Quebec. At the Montreal Forum, in an almost unprecedented display of anti-American sentiment, many fans went so far as to boo the Star Spangled Banner before a hockey game

Let us assume that Canada is a family with completely polarized internal opinions. The federal government was now faced with a potential political shootout between Quebec and a slim majority of English Canadians outside Quebec. This is every Prime Minister's nightmare. In family law jargon, we call this a potential "high conflict scenario." Similar "high noon" situations occurred before the Boer War, World War I, and the conscription crises in World War II (when there were riots in Quebec) that almost tore the country apart. And remember that as recently as 1995, the Quebec referendum for sovereignty won by only a handful of votes (50.56% YES, 49.44% NO).

In this mix we have a Quebec election and an electorate that, according to the pollsters, was far more interested in following the Iraqi war than the Quebec election.

Now pretend you are a "family law" lawyer. You represent someone pro-American in the Court of public opinion, as follows.

YOUR POSITION AS THE REPRESENTATIVE OF YOUR PRO-AMERICAN CLIENT

For the Prime Minister to involve Canada in the Iraqi war of liberation would greatly satisfy your client and perhaps the majority of Canadians, primarily in English Canada. It would particularly satisfy most (but not all) Jewish Canadians. It would also be morally correct to stand by Canada's American friends and other allies in the same way that they have stood beside Canada throughout the past century. It would be a just war against a genocidal dictator whose mission is to destroy Israel, and who tortures and murders many of his own people, including children. This also happens to reflect my very strongly felt personal opinion; in other words, I, John Syrtash, private citizen, am in favour of this position.

I now invite you to think like an experienced family law lawyer. Welcome to the world where veteran matrimonial counsel are constantly having to mull over intractable decisions. Here is the main point: to do so, you must first realize and understand why your opponent is thinking the way he does. We cannot simply assume that the opponent is "irrational" and "being difficult."

You vs. Chrétien: understanding your opponent's position

THE POSITION OF OPPOSING COUNSEL, I.E. CHRÉTIEN

I personally take exception to this position, but as "opposing counsel", I need to understand it. In the Prime Minister's mind, a decision by Canada to join the war would likely have led to another separatist government in Quebec. Is there any doubt that Premier Landry would have used a decision to join the war to prove to the people of Quebec that Canada does NOT represent their interests when so many of them (85%, and more than likely close to 100% of francophones) were so clearly against participation in it?

The decision would have meant a disaster for the leader of Quebec's Liberal Party Jean Charest. That party is identified by all Quebeckers as the "federalist party" in that province. This is especially true given that Jean Charest needed "extra" support among francophone Quebeckers to win; he could not just "tie" the P.Q. in the popular vote due to the way in which Quebec's ridings are distributed.

Moreover, if the P.Q. could muster such anger over the Iraqi war, then that anger could well have provided the "winning conditions" Landry needed to call a separatist referendum immediately after the election. He could theoretically have been successful, and Canada as we know it would have ceased to exist.

This is hardly how Jean Chrétien would have liked to have been remembered just before he stepped down as the country's leader: that is, as Canada's last Prime Minister. Chrétien's instincts doggedly told him that keeping the country together was even more important than alienating Canada's most important trading partner and dearest friend. If we have a dismembered Canada, he probably reasoned, we may not have a Canada for the United States to be a trading partner with.

If I am correct, in Mr. Chrétien's thinking a new leader such as Paul Martin was waiting in the wings to pick up the pieces with the United States and to make amends with the Americans after he (Chrétien) retired. Meanwhile, the threat of Quebec separatism was over, for now. Mr. Charest won by a strong majority and the Prime Minister's political strategy was vindicated.

Let us then assume that this is your opponent's thinking. You have now actually achieved something significant by transcending your own client's bias or hostility and coming to an understanding of why your opponent thinks the way he does.

How do now negotiate with someone like Mr. Chrétien? At the very least, as much as you oppose his actions you may, for the first time, have some grudging respect for his motives. You certainly do not call him a "coward" or someone "failing in leadership". Perhaps by "keeping quiet" about concerns regarding Quebec's elections, he wished to avoid a backlash in English Canada against Quebec for his decision, which, in turn, could have again doomed Jean Charest's chances once the Quebec press reported how many Anglophones resented the need to molify Quebec as the "official" reason for not assisting our American friends in their hour of need.

Cowardice? I think not; if so, then why did the Chrétien administration respond with military participation in other crises (Bosnia, Kosovo — which also lacked U.N. approval — or Afghanistan)? In any event, name calling in "high conflict cases" never works, even if it appears to be justified: it just alienates your opponent and third parties such as Judges, mediators, custody "assessors" and lawyers. It also wastes money in useless letters. This is called "posturing". Some lawyers send many such letters to impress their clients and to show them how "tough" they are. Meanwhile they rarely have any value, except to drive up legal costs significantly.

Posturing: a waste of time and money

At this stage, two veteran lawyers often sit down face to face and, if they have goodwill and sincere intentions, try to find common ground, always keeping each other's motives in mind and trying, firmly but rationally, to advance their client's position.

Of course, there are other positions and actions taken by Mr. Chrétien unrelated to the Quebec election that critics have justifiably criticized:

- his constant attacks on Mr. Bush after the Quebec election;
- his self-aggrandizement over Mr. Bush's economic policies in the face of Bush's problems with 9/11 (which problems Canada did not have to face);
- his refusal to correct Ministers who personally insulted the United States and its leader.

None of these positions appeared to be necessary or defensible. These fall into the category of "abusive and needless letter writing", in the jargon of family law.

This is not about Jean Chrétien and whether he was right or wrong. It is about the principle of compromise, and how it can be nurtured and achieved. Perhaps meetings behind closed doors between the parties' leaders could have taken place to examine compromises if there was a true understanding of all that was happening to the many stakeholders, including the opposition parties. Perhaps a conference with the Americans could have been quietly convened to explain the political delicacy of the situation, and why the U.S. would not want a dismembered Canada. Perhaps Canada could have diplomatically offered informal assistance to the United States in exchange for a request that the U.S. make no formal demands.

During the Boer War, for example, a creative solution was adopted. The French/English dispute over sending Canadian troops to the British Imperial War in South Africa was resolved by the federal government sending a volunteer army. Nobody really liked this particular solution, but at least there was a sincere attempt at compromise.

Only with mutual understanding can compromise be achieved

There are usually many creative solutions once people of good will truly understand the difficulties their opponent faces.

Instead, we often find clients complaining about each other with some Judge making family law decisions to nobody's satisfaction and at horrendous cost. Fortunately, most matrimonial lawyers work hard to prevent this from happening.

Once again, only when the family law lawyer thoroughly understands opposing counsel and believes that there has been an honest exchange of information can he hope to strike a deal. The hard part is to convince your opponent, not the Judge, how you are thinking and to prove it. If you have to go to a Judge it means that you've failed. The reasons for such costly failures are:

- Your opposing counsel or his client are not as interested in an honest exchange of viewpoints and financial disclosure as you are;
- They are simply too suspicious because they have not been given all the information or sufficient good reasons by you or your client to come to the bargaining table in good faith.

To have a productive exchange, you not only need to provide such disclosure and transparent arguments about your motives, but you must also provide convincing reasons that make good common sense. You have to work your way to the stage where the other side finally will grant you grudging respect for your motives – not necessarily to agree with them but to respect them — and for you to do the same.

That is the key to success in high conflict negotiations. Abusive letter writing gets you nowhere; it merely invites equally abusive replies. Shalom.

Christian-Jewish talks resume

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

National talks between Jews and Christians are back on, more than a year after pointed statements from Christian churches blaming Mideast violence on Israel led the Jewish side to suspend involvement in the dialogue.

Canadian Christian-Jewish Consultation, which has brought together leaders from both religions about three times a year since 1977, was scheduled to resume talks at the Roman Catholic diocese in Kingston June 18.

Canadian Jewish Congress suspended its participation in the dialogue last April, after public statements by Anglican and United Church leaders blamed Mideast violence squarely on Israel.

In statements published in a national newspaper, the moderator of the United Church of Canada, Marion Pardy, said the root of the violence and instability is Israel's "illegal occupation of Palestinian territories," adding that Israel "will ultimately have to withdraw from Palestinian territories" if peace is truly desired.

Michael Peers, primate of the Anglican Church of Canada, sounded similar sentiments, saying the current violence has deep roots, but that Israel's occupation "is at its heart... When Israel withdraws from its illegal occupation of Palestine, when Palestinians are free to return in peace to their homeland, when civilians are no longer the targets of terror, either for suicide bombers or government tanks, then healing will begin."

Congress called Peers' pastoral letter the last straw, and announced that it was pulling out of the consultation.

Anglican-Jewish relations were already shaky. In 2001, the Anglican Journal reported on a five-day visit to the West Bank and Gaza by Canadian church leaders and repeated Palestinian comparisons of the situation "to a second holocaust."

CJC president Keith Landy said Congress pulled out because the churches flouted the dialogue's rules on making public statements without consulting their Jewish partners.

"It was clear there really wasn't dialogue in the sense that a number of members decided they would avoid a protocol that was previously established, namely, that they would express views on the Middle East without following the protocol to table such views," Landy said last week.

He said a "further protocol" was to be debated in Kingston.

The Middle East still weighs heavily on Jewish-Christian relations, said Sister Jean Goulet, director of ecumenical and interfaith relations for the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops.

"Everyone wants peace, but the question is, how do we go about it?" she told The CJN.

The agenda at the June 18 meeting was to have included approval of a document intended to bring both sides back to the table. Goulet declined to discuss its contents. "It's about co-operation and how to move forward."

The national consultation involves about 20 officials from the Roman Catholic, Lutheran, Presbyterian, United and Anglican churches. The Jewish side is represented by three pulpit rabbis and four community officials.

During the past year, Congress has continued its participation in the Christian-Jewish Dialogue of Toronto, a local effort.

Longtime JF&CS staffer 'was more than a money person'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Obituary

Four weeks before her death on June 5 from pancreatic cancer, Eva Landa still managed to get to her office at Jewish Family and Child Service (JF&CS) one or two mornings a week.

"She would have paid to work there," said her husband Arthur, executive director of Associated Hebrew Schools. "Her training was in accounting, but her love of JF&CS was largely with respect to her ability to help people."

Eva Landa, who was the JF&CS director of administration and financial assistance services, was born in Budapest 61 years ago. As a small child in her mother's arms, she was rescued by Raoul Wallenberg when he pulled them off a train, Arthur said.

In 1956, the family moved to Montreal, where she attended Sir George Williams University. She graduated with a bachelor of commerce degree in 1961.

Prior to moving to Toronto in 1980 to set up a branch of her family's business, Landa spent three years as controller of the Young Men's and Young Women's Hebrew Association of Montreal.

Among her non-work activities, she participated in the first Yad Beyad program, teaching English to Russian olim in Israel in the early 1990s.

Gordon Wolfe, executive director of JF&CS, who hired Landa 20 years ago as controller, realized right away that she was "more than a money person, more than a number cruncher. She really cared about the Jewish community and she cared about people."

Eva Landa

Her evolution from controller to her most recent position reflected her love of the program she oversaw, which allocated money to JF&CS clients in need, said Wolfe.

Landa's daughter Jacqueline Fabian recalled her in a eulogy as someone with energy, determination, grace, a great sense of humour and a zest for life.

In addition to her husband of 22 years, she is survived by her parents, George and Maria Hegedus, children Jacqueline and David Fabian, grandchildren Matthew and Jillian Fabian, and stepsons Adam, Jeremy and Shaun Landa.

Jewish Education...

For the Sake of Learning

Marshall Kesten
Chair,
UJA Federation
Board of Jewish Education

Dr. Seymour Epstein (Epi)
Vice-President for Jewish Education,
UJA Federation
of Greater Toronto

As we approach the end of the 5763 school year, we reflect on the thousands of hours that Jews have spent over the last year studying the riches of our literary, legal, and moral legacy. Think of the school children learning the shapes of our ancient alphabet (the very source of the English word we use for it), the teachers preparing the next day's class in Torah, the men who rise early to study the day's portion of Talmud at 6:00 AM, the women who gather in evening chugim to pore over a sacred text, the youth workers who read Zionist literature to prepare their next program, families engaged in a program that transcends generations, the tutor drilling a student on the finer details of dikduk...

Someone recently asked us to find a study that illustrates the effectiveness of Jewish schooling in preventing intermarriage and assimilation. Not only do such studies exist, but it's fairly obvious that a Jew who is Jewishly literate, with reinforcement from both a proudly Jewish family and an active Jewish community, will probably continue a lively identification with Jewish customs and values. That, however, misses the point. The reason Jews of all ages study Jewish sources is found in our first document, the Torah. "You shall teach them diligently" is a formula we taught the entire world. It is our strategic plan. We do it for its own sake in the same way that we honour our parents, care for the poor, and practice business ethics. Talmud Torah, the act of Jewish learning, is a value in itself as much as it is our assurance of a flourishing future.

We are proud of this community's commitment to Jewish education, but we know that there is still much to do on the road to universal Jewish literacy. As we study the summer text of Pirkei Avot (Ethics of the Fathers) we are reminded that while we are not obligated to complete the task, neither do we have the right to ignore it.

Schools Turn to Israel

by Suzanne Wintrob

Enhanced by its extraordinary diversity, Toronto's Jewish school system placed Israel front and centre this academic year. Here's how our numerous day schools and supplementary schools uniquely celebrated the State of Israel.

At Toronto Jewish Academy Ohr Menachem, senior kindergarten students held a Shavua Yisrael (Israel Week) to connect them with the land of Israel. Led by teacher Rachel Sevy, the 18 children spent the week making flags, maps, and a bird of peace, learning Israeli songs, and tasting Israeli foods such as falafel, couscous, sunflower seeds and hummus. They paraded into the other classrooms proudly displaying their arts and crafts, and then took a "trip" to Israel to visit popular tourist sites including the Dead Sea, where they learned about salt and the effects of flotation.

For Yom Ha'atzmaut, the Grade 6 students and teacher Michele Herrmann led a school-wide assembly that began with a tribute to Israel's fallen soldiers, with each student representing a soldier killed in one of Israel's battles. The Grade 2 and 4 students and their teachers Nili Shane and Nechama Drookman concluded the assembly by animating the poem Israel My Beautiful Blossoming Land by Datya Ben Dor.

The hall was exquisitely decorated with a Kotel full of children's handprints, Midrashic stories on the walls, and dozens of Israeli flags.

The event, which drew more than 200 people, began with a Yom Ha'atzmaut service led by Solel Congregation Rabbi Lawrence Englander. The children lit candles to express their hopes for peace.

****

For more than a decade, over 300 students in Grades 5 to 8 at Eitz Chaim Schools have steeped themselves in Torah, Talmud and Mishnah to raise money for Israel. This year's UJA Federation affiliated Learn-a-thon, held just before the holiday of Shavuot, was no exception, with close to $10,000 raised for the Jewish State.

"Israel is in a bad situation so the least we can do is learn Torah for Israel and its merits," says Moshe Hillel Lipson, 13. "We just want to try our hardest to support Israel as much as we can."

****

The Toronto Heschel School, which uses the arts to teach everything from Chumash to science, celebrated Israel this year in a variety of arts-based ways. As part of the school's Yom Ha'atzmaut Israeli Songfest, every class presented a song or dance and an art project based on the theme of peace. During their Ontario curriculum unit on pioneers, the Grade 3 students studied Israeli pioneers and they borrowed a huge interactive floor map of Israel from the BJE in order to explore the country's geography, people and culture.

On Yom Yerushalayim, the children again used song, art and movement to discuss Jerusalem in a variety of ways - its history, its literature and poetry, its conflicts, and the contributions of its citizens to Israeli society and to the world at large.

****

With almost all of Yeshivat Or Chaim's graduates heading to Israel for at least one year of Torah study, it's no wonder Israel is the focus of most school activities.

Over the past year, students at the school undertook a number of fundraising efforts to help our beloved state. They raised $1,000 to support Israel's MIAs (soldiers missing in action) by selling blue lapel ribbons, $1,200 to help poor families in Israel through Od Yosef Chai by selling mishloach manot at Purim, and donated 10 per cent of money raised through school barbeques, Sukkah building and a pre-Pesach car wash to local and Israeli charities.

Special guest speakers also brought students closer to Israel. And that's not all. The entire grade 12 class - both at Or Chaim and at Ulpanat Orot girls school - participated in a birthright Israel experience during winter break. A number of boys joined the March of the Living, and two students - Daniel Gutenberg and Yonatan Halpern - came in first and second respectively in this year's National Bible Contest.

"The ideology of our school is fixed upon Israel and we all feel for the Jews there," says Grade 11 student Yoni Grysman, who organized the school's recent family learning program in which 115 boys and their fathers completed a tractate of Talmud in memory of Israel's victims of terror.

Beit Sefer Solel, the only supplementary school in Mississauga, with 230 students from preschool to Grade 10, held an Israel Fair and raised more than $1,900 for 10 Israel-based organizations. The Grade 6 class, under the guidance of teachers Esther Turner, Judy Miller and Judith Tamari, researched various organizations and then created 10 booths with accompanying display boards to describe each one. Visitors to the Israel Fair bought $3 tokens as they entered the hall and dropped as many tokens as they wished into the charity of their choice.

...On the Move

A Maximum Learning Opportunity

Donald Bennett

As accountant Donald Bennett puts it, mini is maxi."It's interesting, it's exciting, it's provocative, and it has certainly increased the sum total of my Jewish knowledge," says Bennett about the Florence Melton Adult Mini School in Toronto, sponsored by the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education and the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism.

Bennett, part of the school's first 20 graduates who earned a certificate in Jewish studies from the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, at a ceremony held earlier this month, spent two hours a week over the past two years learning about Jewish history, lifecycles, concepts and ethics. The text based curriculum, developed at Hebrew U., is completely interactive, with no exams or grades - just learning on a high level. There are currently more than 65 students in the school.

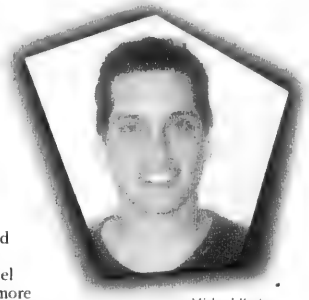
"Some people are making up for lost time because they did not have the opportunity to study as a child or have forgotten what they learned," says school director Loretta Tanenbaum. "Others are anxious to be able to create a Jewish environment for their children or grandchildren, while still others want to be able to answer their friends, neighbours and colleagues when they are asked questions about Judaism."

Graduate Patricia Tolkin Eppel, UJA Federation's Director of Planning for York Region, says some of her most satisfying academic time was as an undergraduate student in philosophy and biblical studies at the University of Dublin in Ireland. That's why she was delighted to happen upon the Florence Melton School which, she says, offers adult education in the context of a well conceived curriculum.

"While text is unchanging, the interpretative process and intensive discussion are what define Jewish study," she says. "It is that process, as much as the content, which has honed great Jewish minds over the generations. The Florence Melton School, led by exceptional teachers with diverse academic backgrounds, gave me an appreciation for the value of that process. I highly recommend this thoughtful, stimulating adult education program. It exceeded my expectations."

Beginning in September, the Florence Melton Adult Mini School will offer both morning and evening classes. For information call (416) 789-7400.

Bible Brings Dreams to Life



Michael Kurin

Michael Kurin couldn't believe the rush he felt as he competed on a Jerusalem stage this past Yom Ha'atzmaut as a competitor in the International Bible Contest.

"Past winners told me it was their trip of a lifetime but I just couldn't imagine what could be so special," says the Grade 11 student at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT), Richmond Hill campus, who placed second in this year's Diaspora competition. "But when I got to Israel, I completely understood what they meant. The experience was unbelievable, especially meeting so many kids from all over the world."

Despite months of preparation that took him away from his friends, Michael admits he was extremely nervous when he and his family first walked into the hall where the competition took place. He then endured a grueling day of oral and written tests and was totally surprised each time they called his name to advance to the next level. The shock stayed with him the entire day, especially when he came in second after a competitor from New York. "It was a great honour to represent Canada," says Michael, 16, who competed in Israel together with other 2002 Canadian contest winners Hillel Nadler, Leah Breslow and Gilad Ben-Shach. "During the Nationals, I was always so impressed to know people who made it to the Israel contest. I truly never thought I'd get there."

Michael, a Bible contest contender since Grade 7, says he couldn't have done it alone. He credits his Judaic studies teachers at both United Synagogue Day School and CHAT-RH for instilling in him a love of Ivrit and Tanach and a greater love of learning. His proud family kept him on schedule, he says, by overlooking his household chores and encouraging him along the way and he especially thanks his parents, Susan and Jack Kurin for that. His friends took all his studying in stride and even declared his return from Israel as Michael Kurin Day with banners and a huge cake.

"If I were in public school, nobody would understand why I was doing this," he says. "It would just be weird to be always studying and never going out. But my friends were extremely supportive and that meant so much." Michael hopes to see more Canadians win big in future Bible contests and he'll be offering his tutoring services to help them get there. "Students who represent Canada have invested months of heavy-duty studying to get to the competition level," says Silvia Eilath, Judaic Studies Day School Consultant at the Board of Jewish Education and Coordinator of the Bible Contest. "In fact, this year's Nationals in Montreal drew students from a wide variety of schools representing every branch of Judaism. That's the beauty of this contest."

Fund Nurtures Educational Innovation

Lindy and Sheldon Goodman have always believed that Jewish education is essential for the future of the Jewish community. That's why the Toronto couple has focused their volunteer efforts on many aspects of Toronto's Jewish educational world and why it was natural for them to align themselves with Midrash, a project backed by UJA Federation's Jewish Toronto Tomorrow initiative that matches the needs of the community with the ideals of passionate donors.

"The goal of the Gross and Goodman Family Fund is to identify new tools to enhance Jewish education throughout the community," explains Lindy.

"Sheldon and I firmly believe that the future of Jewish education will define the future of the Jewish people, so it is vital that new approaches and methods are identified so that our educators can instill a desire for Jewish learning in our children. Midrash helps them take these solid steps forward."

Since its launch by the Board of Jewish Education in 2000, Midrash - the term referring to the first Rabbinic commentaries on the Bible - has been providing teachers and families with effective new tools for enhancing Jewish education. The program consists of four interconnected "houses":

• Teacher Training and Staff Development: The New Teachers' Network offers beginning teachers a forum for professional development and support. The Reflective Practice program gives experienced teachers opportunities for personal and professional growth aimed at extending their abilities to meet the diverse needs of their students.

• Etgar (Hebrew for challenge), a teacher incentive program, encourages day school and supplementary school teachers to submit proposals for funding to develop innovative educational materials. More than 11 exciting projects are underway, ranging from Firsts for Jewish Women to Psalms, Music and Healing.

• Mishpacha (Hebrew for family) provides both funding and professional development in the area of Jewish Family Education. This is an outreach program of sorts, giving families the opportunity to create richer Jewish lives.

• Research is also crucial to Midrash, enabling the BJE to learn more about the community and its needs. An econometric model, for example, is examining tuition fees and how schools use their funding. The results will allow the BJE to help individual schools set their fee structures and learn how these decisions impact their parent population.

"Thanks to the partnership between the Gross and Goodman Family Fund and the Board of Jewish Education, huge inroads have been made over the last few years in all areas of professional development and research," says Ruth Rohn, the BJE's Family Education Consultant and Etgar Coordinator. "By working in concert with our valued donors, we can ensure our children grow up with a deep pride in their heritage and a positive look towards the future of the Jewish people."

New Holocaust museum opens

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

Premier Jean Charest and Liberal MP and prime minister-hopeful Paul Martin joined numerous other political and Jewish leaders June 8 at the Gelber Conference Centre in calling on the recently renovated museum in the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre (MHMC) to keep the legacy of the lost six million alive for future generations.

"If we ask one [thing] of our children, it should be that they bring their own children here," Charest told an audience of more than 1,000 at the museum's official inauguration.

The event was a historic one for the Jewish community, the culmination of years of planning to transform the 24-year-old centre into Canada's first Holocaust museum and educational resource. The $5-million cost was underwritten by all levels of government as well as private sources. It opens to the public June 30.

Included in the audience were hundreds of Holocaust survivors, who gathered two hours before the program began for a reception in a specially erected tent in the courtyard behind 1 Cummings Square.

Security was tight as guests, including former Quebec premiers Lucien Bouchard and Bernard Landry, Montreal mayor Gérald Tremblay, Federal Revenue Minister Elinor Caplan, Bloc Québécois leader Gilles Duceppe and many other dignitaries, arrived for the almost three-hour program hosted by master of ceremonies Marvin Tanner, the museum's outgoing president.

All the speakers, who addressed the audience either from the podium or through pre-recorded video messages, such as Elie Wiesel, expressed their admiration for the new museum and talked about the meaning of the Holocaust and the dedication of those who brought the project to fruition.

Charest, who toured the museum with his son, Antoine, 15, said he was struck by how the museum conveyed what he called the utter "indifference" of the world as the Holocaust began to unfold insidiously over time.

"The rest of the world turned its back," he said.

He said the museum tells "a great story of love that accompanied this horror... a story of courage and determination."

Martin ardently defended Israel's right to exist and recollected his childhood in Windsor, Ont., far removed from the Holocaust he had heard nothing about.

He said the Holocaust is a tragedy that "tests the very limits of what I understand about humanity."

To loud applause, Martin assured Israeli ambassador Haim Divon that Israel's right to exist, born out of the "ashes of genocide," should never be called into question.

"What happened will never, never, happen again," Martin vowed.

The museum's archives contain 6,000 items and 3,000 hours of testimony. They include 418 artifacts and 372 photos, almost entirely donated by survivors living in Montreal, the third largest survivor community in the world, and per capita the second largest (Israel is first).

Divon called it "fitting" that the museum be in Montreal, the "cradle of Jewish life in Canada."

Caplan, speaking on behalf of Prime Minster Jean Chrétien, lauded Canada's current policy of tolerance but decried its wartime policy of turning away Jews at its borders and its internment camps. She called the museum a "true and outstanding accomplishment for Canada and the world.

"It will help the story be told for generations to come."

BJE adds $1 million to education budget

While he said achieving universal access is one of the BJE's strategic objectives, Epstein acknowledged that "we are far from achieving that goal."

However, he said the funding increase is part of an effort to bring tuition assistance more in line with current middle income salaries.

The current guidelines allow a family earning a gross income between $98,500 and $100,499 to apply for subsidies that would allow them to pay tuition of $9,450 for one child, $12,200 for two, $14,400 for three and $18,950 for four.

The children can be in different schools, as long as they are affiliated with and funded by the BJE, Epstein explained.

Right now, Epstein said, the most effective way to provide relief for tuition expenses is through subsidies.

Since the BJE can only provide $7.85 million towards the $120 million needed to operate Jewish day schools in Toronto, subsidies seem to be the most effective way to provide assistance, Epstein said.

"Subsidies allows the BJE to provide assistance because money can be targeted at those families who need it most," he said.

But, he added, in implementing this policy, the BJE has always had to balance two issues: allocating community resources efficiently while still being sensitive to parents who ask for assistance.

Epstein said the BJE must also take other factors into account when allocating funds. "There are now schools applying for funding that haven't received money before, and some of those schools have a lot of tuition-assisted students."

Rabbi Moshe Stern, spiritual leader of Shaarei Tefillah Synagogue and a past president of the Vaad Harabanim, said that while the increase in federation funding is a step in the right direction, he doesn't believe it will be sufficient to meet the needs of families that are struggling.

"I understand the demands on federation money – both here and in Israel. But Jewish education must be a priority," he said.

Wayne Levin, a spokesperson for a group of day school parents that is advocating for lower tuition fees, said he is "extremely pleased to see that UJA Federation is extending both their support for Jewish day schools and their leadership position among North American communities by substantially increasing their funding for those requiring tuition assistance.

"We hope that this additional support will allow the schools to revise their 2003/04 tuition fees downward and ensure that those parents who planned to remove their children from the day schools will able to reconsider," he said.

The Star blames Israel for undermining peace

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The Toronto Star's editorial, "Mideast recklessness" (June 11) captured a widespread western sentiment that Israel's failed attempt on June 10 to kill Abdel Rantisi, a Hamas leader, was a case of bad timing – "atrocious" was the paper's exact term.

The reigning logic at the Star and other media outlets seems to be that Hamas is merely a negative force – a "militant Palestinian group" – and not the terrorist organization that even the Canadian government now acknowledges it is. The Star feels that Israel's attempt to kill Rantisi while Palestinian Authority (PA) Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas is trying to "broker a ceasefire" with Hamas, Islamic Jihad and Fatah's own Al-Aqsa brigades inflames Hamas and undermines peace efforts.

As appealing as this argument is, it is based on a number of fallacies. Fairly, the Star acknowledges that "Hamas has killed hundreds" and that "[Israeli Prime Minister Ariel] Sharon was provoked, to be sure" by Hamas' murder of four soldiers "even as Sharon began to uproot" settler outposts.

However, the paper fails to recognize that Israel cannot allow a charade to continue in which it complies with its commitments under the road map while Hamas and other terrorist groups, now explicitly acting in concert, murder Israelis. Seven Israelis were killed in the days just after their government started dismantling outposts and began allowing more Palestinian workers into Israel.

Moreover, contrary to the Star's assertion that Abbas struggled to broker a ceasefire with Hamas, two crucial points must be made: First, the road map demands not merely a ceasefire, but also the disarming and dismantling of the terrorist groups. Second, Abbas is severely constrained by PA President Yasser Arafat who has colluded all along with the terrorists. Abbas is powerless to act effectively against extremists dedicated to Israel's destruction and has openly declared that he has no intention of using force to rein them in.

The PA as presently constituted also cannot act against terrorism and violence. Indeed, Arafat's continuing role as head of five security services is itself a serious violation of the road map's call for true reform of the PA. Israel must act when its civilians and soldiers are being targeted. The Toronto Sun cogently defended this position in its editorial, "Israel has the right to fight back" (June 12).

Other leaders in this situation would act exactly the way Sharon did. But since Israel is always judged by impossibly higher standards than any other democracy, it faces international criticism unknown anyplace else.

Returning to the Star's fallacies, let us quickly note the following: Sharon's actions did not stir up Hamas' "fury." Rather it was the effort to initiate the road map, which Rantisi so vehemently opposes, that provoked the organization's wrath. And the Star's claim that most Palestinians "want a state of their own, for peace" is belied by the latest poll results from the Pew Research Center, which indicate that 80 per cent of Palestinians consider their "rights and needs" incompatible with Israel's existence.

The slaughter of 17 Israelis, as of this writing, on a Jerusalem bus on June 11 was just the latest Hamas atrocity. It hearkens back to the murderous campaign of February and March of 1996 when then-Israeli prime minister Shimon Peres accelerated the implementation of the Oslo process – a frightening prospect for groups like Hamas, Islamic Jihad and even major elements of Fatah.

Hamilton's 'Rabbi Z' says goodbye at UJA Walkathon

By PHYLLIS SHRAGGE
Hamilton Correspondent

HAMILTON — Like the Pied Piper, "Rabbi Z" led his eager followers – adults, children and even dogs – on a 5.5 km walk through the streets of Hamilton (Hamlin?) on a balmy Sunday morning.

But unlike the original story, the ending to this one was uplifting.

The sky had threatened rain, but fortunately it held off until the evening. The 2003 UJA Walkathon, held June 8, went off without a hitch.

Walkathon co-chairs Andrea Molot and Jill Gaffe.

Promoted as the farewell walk about town for Rabbi Irwin Zeplowitz, spiritual leader of Temple Anshe Sholom, the event provided a chance for 250 community members to socialize with the man known here as Rabbi Z before he leaves next month to become chief rabbi of the Community Synagogue in Port Washington, N.Y.

Hamilton UJA Federation and the Hamilton Jewish Community Centre sponsored this year's walkathon, which was co-chaired by Andrea Molot and Jill Gaffe. The walkathon has raised $17,500 to date, and additional commitments are expected to bring the total to $20,000.

Corporate sponsors are responsible for about half the total, while individuals canvassing donors raised the rest.

Proceeds will help send Israeli child victims of terror or children who have family members who are victims to one of the summer camps run for disadvantaged children by the Jewish Agency for Israel. The cost per child is $500 a week.

The walkathon will provide the Israeli children an opportunity of a lifetime, Gaffe said.

The camp program gives young victims of terror a chance for a positive summer experience, she said. Some of the children have been injured personally, while others have been orphaned or have parents who have been injured and can no longer work.

Volunteers from the Jewish Community Centre's Camp Kadimah and Camp Gadna helped encourage camp spirit at the event, which was titled A Taste of Summer Camp. Activities included face painting, tie-dying and a magic show. Mandell Xtreme of Toronto provided music.

The annual event enables community members to join together in support of a good cause and have a great time, Gaffe said.

"It's a no-pressure day."

שישאר מ'ינינו

גידי קורן וחברים

מה יהיה

איש ושמו מרטי

ישראל בת חמישים וחמש

"לכבוד חגיגות ה- 55 שברה ישראל את כל שיאי העבר בקבלת סיוע מארה"ב: כל משפחה ישראלית תקבל בממוצע לא פחות מ 14 אלף שקל מהאמריקנים" (שחר גינוסר, ידיעות אחרונות).

בישראל חיים 6.7 מיליון תושבים, מתוכם 5.1 מיליון יהודים. תוחלת החיים בישראל היא מן הגבוהות בעולם גם לגברים(76.7 שנים) וגם לנשים (80.9 שנים). רוב של תושבים ישראלים (3.25 מיליון) נולדו בישראל. מאיפה עלו הכי הרבה יהודים לארץ? מרוסיה 1.1 מיליון, מרוקו 500 אלף ומעיראק 250 אלף.

ונתון די אכזרי לסוף: בשנה שעברה התחתנו בישראל 33 אלף זוגות, אך כ 10,000 זוגות התגרשו.

אבל היכן כמה דברים להיות גאים בהם:

ישראל מובילה בעולם במספר המדענים והטכנאים לנולגולת: 145 ל-10,000 תושבים, לעומת 85 בארה"ב, 70 ביפן, 60 בגרמניה. לישראל יש את מספר הפרסומים המדעיים הכי גבוה לנולגולת בהפרש ניכר, וכך גם מספר הפטנטים ומספר חברות הסטארט אפ. נכון שלא ידעתם?

משפטים שיש רק בעברית

-בוקר טוב אליהו.
-מאיפה אתה בארץ.
-מי לימד אותך לנחוג.
-איפה שָׂרַתְתָּ?
-למה מי מת...
-עוד שנתיים ו-11 חודש יא מָאאיק.
-את יכולה לחלוש לי שתי ביצים?
-אני לא בָּתור, אני רק רוצה לשאול שאלה.
-חברים יש רק באָאָר.

משפטים שיכולים להרוס לך את היום

-משמתים, האי?
-כמה שילמתָ בשביל הסמרטוט הזה?
-תזכירי לי איך קוראים לך....
-מרחוק את נראית הרבה יותר צעירה...
-אין לנו שום דבר בַּמידה שלך...

Outspoken anti-Zionist speaks at U of Waterloo

By LAUREN KRUGEL
CJN Intern

Controversial political science professor Norman Finkelstein gave a talk about the Middle East crisis at the University of Waterloo last Tuesday after the Jewish Students Association tried to prevent him from speaking.

Finkelstein, an outspoken critic of Israel and Zionism and author of the book The Holocaust Industry: Reflections on the Exploitation of Jewish Suffering, is seen by many, including B'nai Brith and Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), as having anti-Semitic views. The lecture was part of "Palestine Week" at the university, organized by the group Students for Palestinian Rights.

Norman Finkelstein

In the speech, titled "Roots of Conflicts: Prospects for Peace," the son of Holocaust survivors drew comparisons between Israel and South African apartheid, the European conquest of North America and even Nazi Germany during the Second World II.

Waterloo's Federation of Students (FEDS) put up $500 for the event and an additional $1,000 came from the Waterloo Public Interest Research Group (WPIRG), a group that supports various environmental and human rights groups.

FEDS president Chris Edey said, "Anytime someone speaks on a passionate and divisive issue, there are going to be two camps: one that thinks it's inappropriate and one that thinks it offers valuable insights."

Tomer Chervinsky, who was on the executive of the JSA last year, said, "I find it very difficult to swallow that they'd fund someone who's appeared on Holocaust denier Web sites... When Ernst Zundel quotes him, you think twice before funding him."

With only about a day to plan, about a dozen members of Toronto's Jewish community took a bus to Waterloo late Tuesday afternoon to support the JSA.

David Horowitz, a University of Toronto student, said, "Our goal is not to get to the fine points of Finkelstein's speech... We're here to stand for the Jewish Students at Waterloo."

At the talk, many in the audience wore keffiyahs, which were being sold outside the auditorium. People with Israeli flags were asked to leave them outside.

Finkelstein's speech was met with both applause and angry interjections.

When he said the Israeli army tortures Palestinian detainees, one member of the audience yelled out, "This is a lie." Another woman added, "This is anti-Semitism."

Finkelstein replied, "I think we just heard from some of the torturers." The majority of the crowd applauded and cheered the remark.

The Brooklyn-born Finkelstein, who teaches at DePaul University in Chicago, said he was to have appeared on the CTS show Michael Coren Live the same night of his speech, but due to pressure of panelists from the B'nai Brith and CJC, his appearance was cancelled

He attributed this to "Dirty, underhanded... Nazi-like tactics" on the part of the two Jewish groups.

(Coren told The CJN he cancelled Finkelstein's appearance on his own after representatives of the two groups refused to appear with him.)

He directed similar sentiments toward students who tried to prevent him from speaking at the university, saying they used "hoodlum, thuggish tactics" to censor him.

When an audience member yelled out, "You're a Nazi," he said it was she who was the Nazi.

"Nazis never like to hear that they're Nazis," he said. To this, many audience members gave him a standing ovation.

One young woman, of German descent who went to hear the speech out of interest, was brought to tears by Finkelstein's reference to members of the audience as Nazis. She stood before the microphone during the question-and-answer period and expressed her hurt.

Finkelstein said he resented her "crocodile tears" and accused her of "playing the Holocaust card."

Then he spoke for the first time about his late parents, who were both Holocaust survivors. He said the lessons he learned from them pushed him to fight for the Palestinian cause.

Finkelstein's face became flushed and in a cracking voice he yelled, "If you had any heart in you, you'd be crying for the Palestinians."

Many in the crowd applauded, while the young woman collapsed on the auditorium stairs, shaking with sobs.

Many JSA members believed the speech would be dangerous, but "an exchange of ideas is always constructive." Edey said.

"[Waterloo students] have a history of demonstrating a great ability to listen to widely differing points of view and make their own judgements."

But JSA president, Sabrina Bowman said the talk "should have been shut down right away because this speaker says things that are generalizations against Jews... For us to have someone like this speak on campus is hurtful and it's isolating the Jewish population."

Teens named Bronfman Fellows

Two Grade 11 students from Toronto, Leah Breslow and Nathan Stall, are among 26 North American teenagers who have received 2003 Bronfman Youth Fellowships for a program designed to develop future community leaders committed to the concept of Jewish unity.

This summer, they will spend five weeks in Israel with the Youth Fellowships program. The 26 Fellows – 13 girls and 13 boys – were chosen from 197 applicants.

Leah, daughter of Mark and Helen Breslow, is a student at Ulpanat Orot High School in Toronto. She is actively involved in the Jewish community, holding positions on both the regional National Conference of Synagogue Youth (NCSY) board and the board of Bnei Akiva.

Nathan, son of Lisa Berger and Richard Stall, is a student at the University of Toronto Schools. He attended Beth Tzedec Congregation, where he studied in both the congregational school and the bar mitzvah program.

While in Israel, the Fellows will participate in seminars, and dialogue with members of the educational staff of the program, as well as with political, intellectual and literary figures.

Another central feature of the program is the commitment each Fellow makes to do at least 40 hours of community service after returning home at the end of the summer.

Over the past few years, Fellows have been involved in a wide variety of projects, including the creation of inter-denominational study groups for teens in Toronto and Washington D.C.

Increasing outrage over violence in Iran

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEHRAN — Police Sunday arrested scores of pro-clergy militants who smashed their way into a Tehran university dormitory and bashed sleeping students in a wave of violence aimed at putting down protests against Iran's Islamic government.

The crackdown came amid increasing outrage over the severity of attacks by vigilantes during four nights of wild clashes against pro-reform advocates calling for an end to the country's conservative Islamic establishment.

The judiciary, which is controlled by hard-line clerics and usually sides with them against Iran's reform movement, ordered the vigilante arrests, a rare move in Iran, where the militants have long enjoyed a virtual free hand in attacking those opposed to supreme leader Ayatollah Khomeini's establishment.

"Scores of people who suspiciously attacked a dormitory and inflicted damages have been identified and arrested," Tehran Radio quoted a judiciary statement as saying Sunday.

Student Mojtaba Najafi said about 200 students were in their rooms in the Hemmat dormitory of Allameh Tabatabai University when the attacks began.

He said more than 50 students were injured and taken to the hospital and about two dozen had disappeared after the attack.

There were also attacks at Tehran University's Chamran dormitory before dawn Sunday, other students said.

Unlike previous nights, no anti-clergy demonstrations were seen before the violence erupted Friday night, when security forces fired machine guns in the air and used tear gas and batons to put down any public opposition to Khomeini's regime.

The Islamic regime is worried about alienating a restive public at a time when the United States is stepping up pressure against Tehran's nuclear program and alleged links to the Al Qaeda terror network.

In related news, the chair of the Foreign Affairs Committee in the Russian parliament's upper house, Mikhail Margelov, came out strongly against allowing Iran to develop nuclear capability during a three-day official visit to Israel earlier this week.

Russia questioning nuclear program

"There is no need for another Muslim country to have nuclear weapons. It is enough that Pakistan already has them. Iran should not be allowed to achieve this capability. Nuclear weapons in another Muslim country would be too much," the up-and-coming parliamentarian and close ally of President Vladimir Putin said.

While in Israel, Margelov met with Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom, Justice Minister Yosef Lapid, Deputy Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, ministers Avigdor Lieberman and Natan Sharansky, MK Shimon Peres and the chair of the Knesset Foreign Affairs and Defence Committee, MK Yuval Steinitz.

Margelov said recent findings by the International Atomic Energy Association that Iran had built an installation for the enrichment of uranium using centrifuges have led the Russian government to formulate a clearer stance regarding Iran. Russia is currently helping Iran build a nuclear reactor in Tehran.

Margelov said he blames Russian intelligence services for not being aware of this development. "Unfortunately, our intelligence services did not know about this," Margelov said in an interview with Ha'aretz.

"Our intelligence proved itself when it discovered that Iran had a program for developing ballistic missiles with assistance from North Korea and other countries, but where was it on the issue of the centrifuges?"

Now, Margelov said, "We are seeking clear answers from them. We want to know what they intend to do with the centrifuges and what the real purpose of their nuclear program is. For many years the Iranians told us that the purpose of the nuclear reactor in Bushehr was to produce electricity.

"Iran is expected to face a serious energy crisis as their oil reserves dwindle and their efforts to produce electricity using natural gas failed. This we knew and we believed them. But now we demand clear answers from them."

Russia is demanding that Iran return the spent uranium fuel rods from the reactors, which can then be used to produce plutonium for nuclear weapons. If Iran does not agree, the Putin government says it will not provide Iran with the uranium necessary to power the nuclear reactor currently being constructed for Tehran.

Solidarity group 'a front' for attacks

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Days before a British suicide bomber detonated an explosives belt in Mike's Place, a bar in suburban Tel Aviv, the bomber and an associate took tea with members of the International Solidarity Movement (ISM), a pro-Palestinian group that promotes "non-violent resistance to Israeli occupation."

ISM immediately disassociated itself from the bombers (one escaped), saying the pair merely tagged along with a group of new arrivals to the region, but Israeli security services quickly began to clamp down on foreign supporters of the Palestinian cause.

One Israeli journalist who has studied foreign supporters of the Palestinian cause says Israeli security is "panicking," coming to realize rather late in the game "how serious [these groups] can be."

David Bedein, bureau chief of the Israel Resource News Agency, said ISM's denials of links to Palestinian violence are hypocritical, since they have explicitly endorsed the Palestinian right to "armed struggle" and actively assist in Palestinian violence.

"They have crossed all red lines by openly embracing and endorsing the armed struggle," he said.

Speaking in a telephone interview from Israel, Bedein said that while ISM says its goal is to mitigate Israeli violence, in reality it serves as "a front to support the [Palestinian] armed struggle" – like the unarmed support units in an army whose efforts make the military wing effective.

Last month, Israeli security forces raided ISM offices in Beit Sahour and the foreign affairs ministry issued a statement that said: "ISM members take an active part in illegal and violent actions against Israel Defence Force [IDF] soldiers. At times, their activity in Judea, Samaria and the Gaza Strip is under the auspices of Palestinian terrorist organizations."

Bedein, who has interviewed several ISM activists in the region, said the group's North American operations ought to be investigated by local law enforcement, since ISM spokespeople openly call for the overthrow of Israel, a country with which Canada and the United States have friendly relations.

Canada is home to an active, if tiny, ISM branch in British Columbia that is pushing to indict Israeli Prime Minster Ariel Sharon for war crimes, he said.

The ISM-Canada Web site claims other support groups can be found in Toronto, Montreal and Winnipeg. (Calls to the ISM's Vancouver office and e-mail to its national office were not returned.)

Later this month, the Palestine Right to Return Coalition (PRRC) will present the ISM with the 2003 Rachel Corrie Award, named after an ISM volunteer who was killed earlier this year in what the Israeli army has described as an accident, at the PRRC's annual convention at the University of Toronto June 20-22.

Though the ISM's orientation is left-wing, "its rank and file tend be be naive follower type people, like in a cult," Bedein said.

"They are not evil, not lefties, just hangers on who want to do a good thing for the world. Then you have a few people at the top manipulating it."

ISM Canada's Web site (www.ismcanada.org) states the ISM is "Palestinian-led" and "trains observers from around the world and co-ordinates their activities within the Occupied Palestinian Territories. Its principal activities revolve around human rights observation and documentation of abuses, direct intervention to mitigate the brutality of Israel's illegal 35-year occupation, as well as practical everyday actions and work in Palestinian urban and rural communities."

Bedein, however, said ISM spokesperson Raphael Cohen, a British Jew, told him the ISM opposes "the Zionist presence in Palestine." Group members have also reported Israeli troop movements to armed Palestinian units, Bedein said, and they intervene at checkpoints to facilitate the transit of Palestinians who may be terrorists. As well, they have prevented Israel from monitoring and closing tunnels used to smuggle arms into Gaza from Egypt.

That's where Corrie was killed. The ISM Web site said Corrie was in clear view, trying to prevent a bulldozer from destroying a doctor's home, but Bedein said he spoke to the doctor, who told him the bulldozer did not threaten his residence. Bedein said his investigation indicate Corrie was seated on a mound of earth, out of view of the bulldozer operator, when she was killed, contrary to the ISM's assertions.

Abella to address OSCE conference on anti-Semitism

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

For the first time, a conference of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE) will focus on the issue of anti-Semitism as a distinct phenomenon, while a Canadian delegate will participate in one of the key discussions on how to tackle the problem.

Ontario Court of Appeal Judge Rosalie Abella will join a panel discussing legislative and institutional mechanisms, including law enforcement, as tools to address violent anti-Semitic incidents.

Abella will lead a Canadian delegation that will include Senator Jerry Grafstein, treasurer of the OSCE's Parliamentary Assembly, as well as MP and human rights advocate Irwin Cotler. The conference will be held in Vienna from June 19 to 20.

In the past, the OSCE has discussed anti-Semitism as part of a broader anti-racist agenda. The Vienna conference will look specifically at manifestations of anti-Semitism in Europe, Central Asia and North America, as well as the role governments and civil society can play in promoting wider tolerance, the OSCE said in a statement.

Abella's husband, Prof. Irving Abella of York University, said the OSCE's focus on anti-Semitism is "an earthquake."

"For Canada to ask a judge, rather than a diplomat, to lead [the Canadian delegation] is significant… They've chosen a person who is Jewish, who is a refugee, born in a displaced persons camp, [the daughter] of Holocaust survivors," he said.

The OSCE addressed the recent growth of anti-Semitism at the 11th annual session of the OSCE Parliamentary Assembly last summer. At the time, Sen. Grafstein urged his colleagues to endorse an American-drafted resolution that called on member states to issue strong denunciations of anti-Semitism.

The 55-member OSCE adopted the resolution unanimously, but Grafstein said he has had trouble mobilizing interest in debating the issue in the Canadian Senate.

More than 150 delegates from participating OSCE states, as well as at least 100 NGOs, are expected to participate in the Vienna conference. The U.S. delegation will include diplomats and congressmen and will be led by former New York mayor Rudy Giuliani.

Egypt trying to mediate Hamas ceasefire

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Under intense pressure from Egypt and the United States, Hamas gave approval in principle Sunday to the Egyptian mediator, deputy intelligence chief Mustafa Albuhaeiry, for an end to terror attacks and military activities as part of a general ceasefire.

Albuhaeiry arrived in Gaza Sunday for a series of meetings with Palestinian factions, starting with Fatah leaders in Gaza, who agreed to a ceasefire based on the Palestinian Authority's acceptance of the road map.

He then went to Sheikh Ahmed Yassin's home to meet with the entire Hamas leadership, including Abdel Aziz Rantisi, who survived an Israeli attempt on his life last week.

Palestinian sources said that in the previous 48 hours, Hamas gave the Egyptians position papers accepting a ceasefire and a cessation of military activity. Talks were still underway for conditions that would include a guarantee of Hamas' future as a political movement, a timetable for the ceasefire, and a guarantee PA security would not arrest Hamas members in the future.

Albuhaeiry, who is tipped to become Egypt's next chief of intelligence and was once responsible for handling Islamic extremists in Egypt, also invited Hamas leaders in Damascus for meetings in Cairo on the ceasefire.

The meetings in Gaza are part of a U.S. push for a ceasefire, with pressure on Hamas, Islamic Jihad and other Palestinian factions, including Fatah's Tanzim. Palestinian sources said Hamas was warned if it did not accept a ceasefire, it would face combined Israeli-Palestinian pressure to eliminating it.

But Israeli Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom warned Israel would reject a temporary truce even if Hamas agreed, saying terrorists would exploit a ceasefire to gear up for fresh attacks. He said a truce to last a few months was no substitute for disarming and dismantling terror groups inside PA territory.

At the meeting in Yassin's house, the spiritual leader of Hamas said his movement accepts the security principles worked out by the PA for accepting security responsibility for Gaza and Bethlehem. Yassin said Hamas went into the meeting with the intention of conducting serious discussions.

PA Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas and Security Minister Mohammed Dahlan were to meet Albuhaeiry in Gaza earlier this week.

Handling the U.S. side of the pressure is State Department official David Satterfield, who arrived Sunday with John Wolf, in charge of the American monitoring of the road map. The U.S. effort to keep the road map on track was to continue in Amman this week when the four leaders of the "quartet," which drew up the road map, were to convene for an economic conference.

The PA cabinet convened Sunday to approve the security deals reached between Israel and the PA over handing over control of northern Gaza.

At the conclusion, the PA issued a statement saying "there is no such thing as one-sided implementation of commitments. The move to the political track and the implementation of the road map requires an end of the assassinations and Israeli incursions into Palestinian territories, as well as a lifting of the internal closures in PA areas and the siege of [PA President] Yasser Arafat."

The process of preparing a handover of northern Gaza to Palestinian security services was to continue this week, Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz told the cabinet Sunday. The Israel Defence Forces was preparing to transfer the Beit Hanoun area to the PA during the week. At the same time, Israel is considering a Palestinian request to expand the "pilot project" to include Bethlehem.

Saturday night, Maj.-Gen. Amos Gilad, the government co-ordinator in the territories, met at U.S. Ambassador Daniel Kurtzer's Herzliyah residence with PA Security Minster Mohammed Dahlan to discuss the arrangement. Israeli sources said the meeting was relatively positive and constructive.

Another meeting between Gilad and Dahlan, this time with Shin Bet officials and PA counterparts, was expected shortly. Israel expects the Palestinians to present a detailed plan for taking security responsibility for northern Gaza, with a particular emphasis on stopping rocket fire on Israel from the area.

IDF sources said there is no reason for the Palestinians not to also get security control in the Bethlehem area, since there have been relatively few terror alerts there lately.

Mofaz said the Palestinians would be judged by the extent to which they prevent terror. He added the process will be "long, complicated and crisis-ridden."

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon told cabinet that "Israel will continue acting against 'ticking bombs' in PA territories, after the United States approved it." He explained there has been a change in the U.S. position on the issue since last week's condemnation of the attempted killing of Rantisi.

He said there are two reasons for this: the Americans understand terror can foil the political process and the dimensions of the Israeli activity against terror.

According to Sharon, "if there's no fire on us, we won't open fire, except for necessary operations for self-defence." He said the PA must accept responsibility for areas under its control.

Mofaz also said "if the PA does not take action against terror, we will."

Sharon's bureau chief Dov Weisglass was in Washington, D.C., Monday to meet with U.S. National Security Advisor Condoleezza Rice, who was expected to tell him Washington wants Israel to hand over security responsibilities as quickly as possible. U.S. sources said she would demand that Israel renew its unqualified backing of the road map.

U.S. President George W. Bush said Sunday he has not lost hope for peace in the Middle East, but insisted the world must deal harshly with terrorists. Bush said he wants to help the Palestinians rein in terrorists, but stopped short of pledging money or arms to the PA to aid it in combating groups such as Hamas.

Plans set for JWI's conference on domestic abuse

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Plans are set for Jewish Women International's (JWI) first-ever conference on domestic abuse in the Jewish community, to be held July 20 to 22 in Baltimore, Md.

The conference, titled Pursuing Truth, Justice and Righteousness: A Call to Action, is geared toward professionals, lay people and volunteers, including community leaders, Jewish and secular domestic violence service providers, survivors of abuse, advocates, rabbis, therapists, social workers and physicians.

Penny Krowitz, executive director of JWI Canada and a member of the conference planning committee, said they are expecting delegates from across North America, including 10 from Toronto, as well as from Israel, the former Soviet Union, Australia, England and Nigeria.

"We are hoping to bring together people who will share ideas, present important information, and essentially try to break the cycle of abuse," said Krowitz, who is presenting at, and co-ordinating, one of the workshops.

JWI has been confronting domestic violence in the Jewish community since the 1980s, when it realized the subject was not being discussed publicly, Krowitz said.

"People denied that it existed in our community, but we went out to shelters and obtained anecdotal evidence that there were Jewish women there."

JWI members in Quebec launched a public awareness campaign and the organization designed and published awareness brochures in four languages, she said.

"To this day, we've given away hundreds of thousands of pamphlets that inform women how to protect themselves, and what to do if they are planning to leave their home."

U.S. members have also published a guide for rabbis, said Krowitz, "because domestic abuse is a complicated issue, and rabbis often do not get that training.

"Eventually, Jewish Family & Child Service [of Toronto] began identifying people in the situation, and they also identified the need for culture-sensitive housing, because it is important for many women to be in an anonymous, Jewish facility."

Jointly, JWI and JF&CS established alternative short-term emergency housing for women, "and we have helped women in Toronto, Montreal, Winnipeg and Vancouver," Krowitz said.

The idea behind the conference, said a brochure, "is to help articulate a global voice that will shape a movement that is Jewish in perspective and practice, a voice to be used as a model for other religious and ethnic communities, and a voice to end violence against women."

At the end of the three days, Krowitz said, the group hopes to come up with a call to action, "and be able to collaborate and co-ordinate all our efforts.

"We all have limited resources, but if we work together we can make a change. People from around the world are going to share their experiences. The networking should be amazing."

In her workshop, Krowitz said, she plans to talk about the models JWI has used in dealing with domestic violence, and about the roadblocks it has faced.

"How do we involve the community in our work, and how do we build a collaborative movement? If we believe passionately about this issue, we need to work together.

"This conference is an incredible opportunity to build that movement and to look at the issue of domestic violence right in the face," Krowitz said.

What people need to understand, she said, is that domestic violence is not always physical. "If there is an imbalance of power and control, then it is an abusive situation.

"People tend not to see abuse that is not physical, but there is emotional, sexual and financial abuse as well. If he is in control, then there are issues."

The conference will include workshops about youth, because "we have to build a society that teaches children that abuse in any form is not acceptable. If we allow it to continue, what role model are we showing our children?" Krowitz asked.

For information on the conference, call 1-800-343-2823 or visit www.jwicalltoaction.org.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. My three-year-old is very constipated. What foods should I give him to help his regularity?

A. It is important that you not only consider which foods are necessary to give to your child, but also which foods might need to be reduced as they may worsen constipation. These foods include bananas and dairy and white rice products.

Which foods you add depends on your child's likes and dislikes and the severity of the constipation. First check with your child's doctor, who may prescribe a laxative, particularly if your child is uncomfortable or has gone for a prolonged period of time without having a bowel movement.

The most important thing to add is fluids – anything from water to prune juice. Also try high-fibre foods such as oatmeal, bran cereals, breads or muffins, dried fruit, fresh fruit and vegetables, legumes (beans), whole wheat pasta, corn and whole grain crackers. When buying whole wheat foods, make sure the ingredients actually list whole wheat flour. Good luck.

Celebrating Jewish subjects from Biblical times to the present

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

The 15th annual Canadian Jewish Book Awards ceremony opened last week with an eerie commemoration as historical footage was screened of German citizens hurling "undesirable" books onto a huge bonfire in a Berlin public square 70 years ago.

Works by authors as diverse as Sigmund Freud, Helen Keller and Thomas Mann were burned on pyres in about 40 German cities in May of 1933, according to Elly Gotz, a Holocaust survivor and member of the committee that stages the awards ceremony each June at the Leah Posluns Theatre in Toronto.

It was with astonishing prescience, Gotz said, that German-Jewish writer Heinrich Heine observed in 1834: "Where books are burned, in the end people will be burned."

Although the rest of the evening was devoted to praising books and not to burning or burying them, the sombre remembrance of the Nazi book-burnings seemed particularly fitting since almost half of the 11 titles honoured featured Holocaust themes.

They ranged from Karen Levine's much-praised children's book Hana's Suitcase (Second Story Press) to Vivian J. Kaplan's account — in Ten Green Bottles (Robin Brass Studio) — of a group of Jews who escaped the Nazis by going from Vienna to Shanghai.

Kaplan's mother, 87-year-old Gerda "Nini" Kosiner, who is the heroine of the book, was in the audience watching proudly as her daughter received the award for biography/memoir.

The evening's celebrity reader, Evan Solomon, host of CBC Newsworld's Hot Type, read from Vancouver writer Nancy Richler's award-winning novel Your Mouth Is Lovely (Harper Flamingo), which deals with a slightly earlier era of Jewish history — Russia between the pogroms and the revolution.

Solomon told the audience that as he was leaving the CBC — "you know that organization that is such a great friend to Israel?" he quipped — someone asked him for a definition of a Jewish book, and he said it is a book on a Jewish subject.

"The subjects that Nancy Richler covers in Your Mouth Is Lovely are specifically Jewish subjects," he said. "Jews can write about anything, but they have to specifically write about Jews because that is their own story."

Miriam Webb, co-chair of the book awards committee, told The CJN that other contenders for the fiction prize included Children of Paper by Martha Blum, Misplaced Place by Maggie Dwyer, Lennie Bruce Is Dead by Jonathan Goldstein, Rogues and Vagabonds by Marilyn Lightstone, and Not Quite Mainstream, a short-story anthology edited by Norman Ravvin.

In terms of history, other award-winners stretched from Biblical times to the present. As an example of the former, Montreal writer Henry T. Aubin captured the history prize for The Rescue of Jerusalem: the Alliance Between Hebrews and Africans in 701 BC (Anchor Canada), which tells how a Kushite army from Africa repelled the invading Assyrians from ancient Israel.

"The story had been forgotten for over a century," Aubin said. "There had been a kind of collective amnesia by scholars on this point."

Representing medieval times, James Diamond won the prize for biblical/rabbinic scholarship for Maimonides and the Hermeneutics of Concealment (State University of New York Press), while Pierre Anctil was one of several award-winners whose work reflects the contemporary era.

Anctil received the Yiddish translation prize for rendering from Yiddish into French Israel Medresh's book, Le Montreal Juif Entre les Deux Guerres (Septentrion). The award was given by Medresh's granddaughter Vivian Felsen, herself a former recipient of the same award.

According to committee members, Anctil was the first award winner to give an acceptance speech in both Yiddish and French. Judging by the appreciative response, there seemed little need for him to repeat it in English. Many people were amazed to learn that Anctil, who is not Jewish, learned Yiddish as an adult to further his investigations into Montreal's Jewish community and related Jewish studies.

This year the 16-person awards committee chose the winners from more than 50 submissions, but in future they may submit a list of semi-finalists to a jury, according to the founding chairperson of the awards, Adam Fuerstenberg.

"When a person is 15, he or she is entering adolescence, but when an institution reaches 15, it's entering its maturity," he said. "By now, there's a special pleasure in realizing that thousands of people have attended at least one of our awards evenings. Our regulars expect it and look forward to it each June."

"We've broken through," said Webb, noting that the book awards has become a major event in Toronto's Jewish calendar. "We need just a little bit more publicity and we'll be there."

Other winners: Ron Charach won the poetry prize for Dungenessque (Signature Editions); Adrienne Kertzer won in scholarship on a Jewish subject for My Mother's Voice: Children, Literature and the Holocaust (Broadview Press); Theresa and Albert Moritz won in Canadian Jewish history for The World's Most Dangerous Woman: A New Biography of Emma Goldman (Subway); Joil Alpern won in Holocaust memoir for No One Awaiting Me: Two Brothers Defy Death During the Holocaust in Romania (U. of Calgary Press); and N. N. Shneidman won in Holocaust history for The Three Tragic Heroes of the Vilnius Ghetto: Witenberg, Sheinbaum, Gens (Mosaic).

Jewish Canada

Toronto and Montreal - home to 75% of Canadian Jewry

By DANIEL HOROWITZ

In 1841 there were approximately 200 Jews living in Canada – the majority of whom had settled in Toronto and Montreal. Today, according to a national Jewish demographic study prepared by Charles Shahar, based on 2001 census data, the numbers are much higher, but the situation is still the same. With Toronto's Jewish community growing close to 180,000 and Montreal's Jewish population at more than 92,000, the two cities are home to almost seventy-five percent of Canadian Jewry.

Of course, today, with Canada's total Jewish population standing at over 370,000, compared to roughly 356,000 in 1991 the nation's Jews are calling Canada home from coast-to-coast.

Canada's largest Jewish centre is Toronto, with a Jewish population that has doubled in one generation. Next is Montreal at 92,970, followed by Vancouver, which boasts 22,585 Jews.

"While this census showed a slight reduction in our numbers, the psychological strength and attitude of Montreal's Jewish community reflects a resurgence, making it a stronger community than we were in 1991," says Danyael Cantor, Executive Vice-President, FEDERATION CJA. "Quebec's Jewish community, while quite diversified, is more cohesive than ever. A community concerned about its future does not invest as much in its infrastructure as we have."

Some of the fastest growing Jewish communities in Canada may be surprising. The Ottawa-Gatineau region, for example, has gained almost 2,000 new Jewish citizens since 1991. That increase of 16.4 percent is the second largest in the nation, slightly behind Vancouver's 16.6 percent increase. "I believe that by the time of the next census – actually, probably by mid-decade – Ottawa will have surpassed Winnipeg as the Canadian city with the fourth largest Jewish population," says Shahar, Chief Researcher, National Demographic Study for UIA Federations Canada, who has combined census statistics for those identifying themselves as Jewish by both religion and ethnicity.

Thousands of Toronto's Jews marched to celebrate Yom Ha'atzmaut.

"Taking only the ethnicity numbers, or the religion numbers on their own, does not give a complete picture of the Jewish community," says Shahar. "It must be a combination of ethnicity and religion numbers together, not one or the other."

The other cities leading the way in Jewish growth over the past decade are Halifax, with a 13 percent increase since 1991, Calgary at 11.1 percent, and Toronto at just over 10 percent.

In terms of the Jewish populace relative to a city's overall population, Toronto weighed in number one overall with almost four percent of the city's 4 million residents being Jewish. Montreal was a close second at 2.8 percent, followed by Winnipeg at 2.2 percent, and Ottawa registering 1.3 percent.

To be even more specific, Shahar says that according to census tracks – a small geographic area used by census-takers - the country's three most densely populated Jewish areas are all in the Greater Toronto Area. "The area with the highest density of Jews in all of Canada is in Toronto between Finch and Steeles, and Bathurst and Dufferin," says Shahar.

Jewish Toronto

Total Toronto population: 4,647,955

1991 Jewish population: 162,605
2001 Jewish population: 179,100

During the past two decades, Greater Toronto and its Jewish community have undergone a profound transformation. Almost half of all Jews in Canada live in Toronto, and approximately one out of every two Jews who live in Toronto today either did not live in the city 20 years ago, or had not yet been born.

Since the 1981 census, Toronto's Jewish community has grown by over 25%, or nearly 34,000 people. In that same year, Toronto surpassed Montreal for the first time as the "Jewish population capital" of Canada, and has not looked back since.

Jewish immigration to Toronto sped up after World War I. Partly as a result of restrictive quotas instituted in the U.S. in 1924, and of great population movements from Europe, the overall population of Toronto grew from roughly 611,000 to 818,000 during the 1920s. The Jewish community of Toronto also increased in significant proportions, and by 1931, close to 47,000 Jews resided in Toronto.

Over the past 10 years, Toronto's Jewish population has continued to flourish largely because of immigration from the former Soviet Union, South Africa, and other Canadian cities.

On May 25, 2003 an estimated 20,000 members of Toronto's Jewish community participated in the UJA Federation Walk with Israel.

Jewish Montreal

Total Montreal population: 3,380,640

1991 Jewish population: 101,210
2001 Jewish population: 92,970

For well over two hundred years, Montreal has been an important cultural and population centre of Jewish life in Canada, home to national, social, religious, and political Jewish organizations. Built on succeeding waves of Jewish immigration, Montreal developed as a cosmopolitan centre rich in tradition with a distinct Montreal "Jewish" flavour.

The distinctiveness of Montreal's Jewish communal identity has much to do with its diversity, and its unique capacity to fashion unity and solidarity among its many elements. The diversity of Jewish life in Montreal is broad and complex, yet it rates high on the cohesion scale.

Almost 4,500 Jewish persons moved to Montreal between 1986 and 1991. Eighty-five percent immigrated from countries outside of Canada. Even with its decrease in Jewish residents, Montreal continues to attract a significant number of Jewish immigrants, and its ability to create, develop and solidify, bodes well for the future of Jewish Montreal.

Jewish Vancouver

Total Vancouver population: 1,967,475

1991 Jewish population: 19,375
2001 Jewish population: 22,585

The Jewish community of Greater Vancouver has undergone an unparalleled rate of growth in the last two decades. Numbering under 8,000 persons up to 1961, Vancouver's Jewish population jumped over 130% in 20 years and almost 100% in the decade from 1971 to 1981. In 1991, Vancouver's Jewish community, standing at over 19,000, surpassed the Jewish community of Winnipeg to become the third largest urban concentration of Jews in Canada, behind only Toronto and Montreal.

By 1911, the census counted 973 Jews in Vancouver and 139 in Victoria. Much of Vancouver's Jewry was part of a massive immigration of Eastern European Jews between 1880 and 1920.

In the years between 1945 and 1952 a rapid expansion of communal organizations and institutions reflected the doubling of Vancouver's Jewish population.

One symbol of Jewish Vancouver's growth was the opening of the Richmond Jewish Day School in 1922 with over 120 students. By 1994, organized Jewish communities existed in White Rock and Surrey, as well as in the Burnaby area. With the continuing attraction of Vancouver's Jewish community, even more communal and institutional expansion can be anticipated for the 21st century.

JEWISH CANADA IS A PUBLICATION OF UIA FEDERATIONS CANADA.

Jewish Canada: the old and the new

By DANIEL HOROWITZ

The 15 to 24 age group represents Canada's future leaders.

Approximately one-third of Canada's Jewish population is under the age of 25. That figure, from a National Jewish Demographic Study undertaken by Charles Shahar for UIA Federations Canada, mirrors the proportion of under-25 Canadians in the general community-at-large.

"The children of baby boomers in the 15-24 age group represent an extremely important group," says Shahar. "They represent the future leaders of our communities. They are the young adults who will some day take over from their parents down the road. As long as we continue to have good numbers in the 15-24 age cohort, the future looks bright."

The proportion of very young Jews in Toronto and Montreal is close to the Canadian Jewish average. The youngest Canadian cities are Calgary, London, Toronto, Vancouver, and Halifax.

"Halifax actually surprised me the most," says Shahar. "They have a wonderful and very young Jewish community there, as does Calgary. Ottawa has the highest percentage of children under 15, while Halifax has the highest percentage of people between 15 and 25. Those are very important age groups and it says a lot about these communities, and bodes well for their futures."

Jewish Toronto is home to more than 35,000 youngsters aged 14 and under.

More than 100,000 Jewish Canadians are between the ages of 15 and 24.

According to the study, Windsor weighed in as the oldest city in the nation with almost 51 percent of its citizens aged 45 and up, with Winnipeg second at just under 50 percent.

For Shahar, the baby boomer segment (45-64), representing 26.5 percent of Canadian Jewry, is perhaps the most telling reflection of a community.

"In Jewish Canada as a whole, the baby boomer presence is felt very strongly as a significant age group," he says. "They are so important because that age has implications on our service industry. We will need to have the services in place that speak to their needs. When the next census comes out, so many of them will have become senior citizens and the Canadian community will have to gear up to help them. The baby boomers represent a large wave in demographic age distribution because they are at a peak."

Jewish Ottawa

Total Ottawa population: 1,050,755

1991 Jewish population: 11,555
2001 Jewish population: 13,450

The Jewish Community in Ottawa has experienced consistent growth since the early 1900's. Numbering 398 Jews in 1901, the Canadian census counted 11,555 Ottawa Jews in 1991. The Ottawa Jewish Community has ranked as Canadian Jewry's fifth largest community since the early 1950s.

Unlike other large Canadian Jewish centres, Ottawa's Jewish community has fewer foreign-born community members. From 1961 to 1971, Ottawa's Jewish population grew by 26.8 percent. From 1971 to 1981, it grew by 43% and from 1981 to 1991 it grew an additional 26.6%. All together, in 30 years, the Jewish population of Ottawa has more than doubled in size.

Jewish Calgary

Total Calgary population: 943,310

1991 Jewish population: 7,155
2001 Jewish population: 7,950

The period between 1960 and 1986 has proven to be the most productive in Calgary's Jewish history. During this period, Jewish Calgary experienced tremendous growth starting with the establishment of two new synagogues, Beth Israel, and Shaarey Tzedec.

The influx of many eastern Canadian Jews to Calgary has had a tremendous impact on the community. They integrated well and have made a valuable contribution. During the 1970s, Calgary welcomed almost 1,000 Russian Jewish immigrants.

Increases in Calgary's Jewish population were part of a general population boom in the city which came about as a result of Alberta's growing oil industry.

One of the most important factors which accounts for the dramatic growth of Calgary's Jewish community over the last 20 years is the increase in the number of Jewish children.

Jewish Halifax

Total Halifax population: 355,945

1991 Jewish population: 1,755
2001 Jewish population: 1,985

The Halifax Jewish community has experienced moderate population growth over the last several decades. In the twenty years between 1971 and 1991, the Jewish population grew by 33.5%, from 1,315 persons to 1,755.

Halifax Jewry grew most rapidly between 1981 and 1991, at a rate of 20.6%, representing 300 people.

The Jewish community of Halifax grew by 20% between 1960 and 1980, numbering close to 1,500 people.

Halifax has always acted as the centre of Jewish life in the Atlantic Provinces and, as in earlier years, synagogue membership is still the most common way of expressing community cohesion. In addition to the two synagogues already present, Halifax is the centre of the Atlantic Jewish Council providing services on behalf of many national Jewish organizations meeting the needs of the 3,000 Jews throughout the region.

ALEX POCH-GOLDIN WINS PLAYWRITING CONTEST

Toronto actor, director and playwright Alex Poch-Goldin has won the Jewish Theatre Committee of Toronto's Canadian Jewish Playwriting Contest for 2003.

Chosen from a dozen entries, Poch-Goldin's play Yahrzeit tells the story of a crusty Jewish businessman whose testy relationship with his wayward son and daughter threatens to derail his plans for a memorial to his late wife.

"I was encouraged to write a play inspired by my own experience of life, and this is what popped out," said Poch-Goldin, 38, who has become a major figure on the Toronto theatre and TV scene since arriving here from his native Montreal 15 years ago.

He has previously authored five plays that have been staged by theatre companies across Canada, including This Hotel, which was produced by Theatre Passe Muraille and was nominated for six Dora Awards. Yahrzeit is his first play with a specifically Jewish theme.

"The writing is confident," said Toronto playwright Dave Carley, a committee jury member. "The author is clearly unafraid of political niceties and willing to show all sides of the coins he unearths."

The winning play receives a professionally directed staged public reading, tentatively scheduled for mid-November in the Miles Nadal JCC.

Two of the the committee's previous prize winners have hit the commercial stage this year. Einstein's Gift by Vern Thiessen was produced by The Theatre Company in Kitchener in April, and This Night (the Kapo) by Robert Mejzels is being staged this month at the Hamilton Fringe Festival. Last year's winning play, Sara's Cave by Don Molnar, is also scheduled to have a staged reading this fall.

As an actor, Poch-Goldin performed in the original cast of Jason Sherman's League of Nathans, as well as in Tony Kushner's Angels in America and Wit for Canadian Stage. He received a Dora nomination for best actor this year for his performance in Bully.

Even before Yahrzeit's public reading, a producer has already signed a contract to tour it throughout Germany, Austria and Switzerland in 2005.

Evita Returns to Toronto: Up-and-coming theatre entrepreneur Michael Rubinoff directs a production of Evita, the acclaimed Andrew Lloyd Webber and Tim Rice musical that focuses on Argentina's controversial first lady, Eva Peron. "Told through a compelling score that fuses haunting chorales with exuberant Latin, pop and jazz influences, Evita creates an arresting theatrical portrait as complex as the woman herself."

Chabad honours Winnipeg rabbi

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Chabad movement is holding a dinner to honour Rabbi Avraham Altein on his 30th anniversary in Manitoba's capital.

"He actually came here in July, 1972," said Rabbi Yacov Simmonds, a dinner organizer and one of Rabbi Altein's associated. "We are getting this dinner in just before the end of his 31st year here."

The event will be held June 26 at the Fort Garry Hotel, one of the city's oldest and classiest. Its banquet facilities will be under the personal supervision of Rabbi Altein for the evening. Organizers expect close to 300 people to attend.

"Rabbi Altein's commitment to the city has been incredible," Rabbi Simmonds said. "He has stayed here through good times and bad, and he is still an effective leader."

His success is not measured in money raised or the members he has recruited, as Chabad has no official membership or dues, Rabbi Simmonds said, but rather by the impact he has had on the city and the institutions he has built.

Rabbi Altein's official role is rabbi of the Ashkenazi Synagogue, the last of the old Orthodox shuls in Winnipeg's North End. He divides his time between the Ashkenazi and Chabad House, the second institution he built here.

The first major institution he built here, in 1978, was a new mikvah to replace the old one in a run-down former steam bath cum apartment block.

Chabad House – the Lubavitch Centre – was built in 1980 in a new subdivision in north Winnipeg. Prior to that, Rabbi Altein operated out of his home. Chabad House was expanded in 1985.

Rabbi Altein started Gan Israel day camp in 1973 and a sleepover camp in the resort town of Gimli, about an hour's drive north of Winnipeg, in 1974. Both are still going strong.

Educating children has always been one of Rabbi Altein's priorities. Chabad operates its own elementary school out of its building.

Over the years, Rabbi Altein has established close relationships with Winnipeg's other Jewish school programs, both public and private. Before or during each Jewish holiday, hundreds of Jewish school children come to Chabad for special programs.

Six years ago, Rabbi Altein opened a second Lubavitch Centre in a storefront in south Winnipeg to serve the growing Jewish population there.

With two younger associates over the past few years, Rabbi Altein has been able to cut back a bit on his activities. "Rabbi Altein used to do the work of 20 people. Now he only does the work of 10 to 15," Rabbi Simmonds said.

Trampoline athlete wins gold at meet

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

If you've seen youngsters on a trampoline bouncing 15 or 20 feet in the air, you might not be surprised that researchers have pronounced the sport more dangerous than riding a bike.

Two doctors at Winnipeg Children's Hospital have reported that in 1996 and 1997, backyard trampolines caused 1.6 per cent of all traumatic injuries treated at the hospital. Bicycle accidents were responsible for only 1.4 per cent of such injuries.

It was a finding that would hardly have surprised Nevin Sendel, who knows only too well the dangers posed by these seemingly innocent children's activities. He has, unfortunately, seen some serious accidents, including broken bones and in one sad case, the paralysis of a young Danish athlete.

Of course, when Sendel sees kids bouncing on trampoline mats, they're usually performing back flips, twists and other contortions that are far removed from simple backyard horsing around.

Sendel's 11-year-old daughter, Samantha, is one of a select group of elite athletes who has mastered the sport and vaulted to national prominence.

Little Samantha, all five feet and 80 lbs. of her, recently captured first place in trampoline at the national Age Group Championship in Saskatoon. She added another gold in the double mini event, a sort of combination vault and trampoline activity while in yet another event, the synchro, in which two athletes perform side by side concurrently, Samantha and partner Amy Stroud blew away the competition, winning by seven points in an event where victory is often measure by tenths of a point.

Altogether, Samantha won five medals in Saskatoon, including a gold as part of team Ontario and a bronze while competing against other age groups.

Her performance earned Samantha a spot on the Canadian national team, which she'll join for the World Age Group Championships in Hanover, Germany, in October.

As Nevin explains it, competitive trampoline athletes are judged by a panel of five experts, who take into account the degree of difficulty in a particular routine as well as the quality of the performance. A white box is painted in the centre of the trampoline, marking the location where competitive athletes must stay to get the most points.

Inside the box, athletes go through their routines, performing flips and twists that closely resemble the sort of contortions divers perform as they soar through the air.

Samantha says she enjoys doing the back flips, but is particularly fond of a double front flip with a half twist during the first flip and a full twist in the second flip. All of that is performed in a heart-stopping two-second span.

One of Samantha's coaches, Angelo Despotas, described her as an "awesome" athlete who has "unbelievable air sense. She knows where she is in the air, she's very co-ordinated." That's a skill that's not too common with kids her age.

Samantha has been competing in the sport for a few years now. In October 1997, when her family moved to Toronto from Montreal, her parents enrolled Samantha and her three brothers in trampoline at Skyriders.

Samantha readily took to the sport. After seeing her perform, one of Skyriders' coaches, David Ross, a two-time Olympic bronze medalist, offered to groom Samantha for the entry level of the provincial championships. Her first year, she won a bronze and within a year Samantha had skipped from entry level to level three. At 10, she was the youngest trampoline athlete at the 2001 Ontario Winter Games, helping Ontario win a team gold medal.

Despotas believes Samantha has a bright future in the sport, with a shot at making the Canadian Olympic team when she's old enough. "She's definitely a competitor," he said. "She loves to compete and she loves to come first. She doesn't give an inch."

Teens named Manitoba Jewish athletes of year

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — A 19-year-old all-star hockey player and a 15-year-old squash star ended up tied for Manitoba Jewish athlete of the year.

The Idy and Max Nusgart Memorial was presented jointly to David Glass and Jacob Micflikier at the 31st annual "Y" Sports Dinner on June 3. Each also received a one-year membership to the Rady Jewish Community centre and $250 from the estate of the late Fred Glazerman, a longtime member of the dinner's organizing committee.

Micflikier plays left wing and centre for the Sioux Falls Stampede of the United States Hockey League and led the team in scoring for the second year in a row. Last year, he was voted to the league all-star team. In the fall, he will be playing for the University of New Hampshire Wildcats.

Glass is one of Manitoba's top squash players and a member of the junior provincial team. He is ranked fourth in the national boys under-15 category. This year, he lost only one match at the Canada Winter Games and helped Manitoba capture the bronze medal in team competition.

The other nominees were 16-year-old swimmer Naomi Casiro and two other young hockey players, 15-year-old goalie Ben Shiffman and 18-year-old forward Adam Corrin.

The dinner generally attracts close to 1,000 people and raises funds for programs at the Rady JCC.

ספרותנו

יעל זליגר

לכבות את האהבה מאת: יוכי ברנדס, ידיעות אחרונות - ספרי חמד

MINI GOAT CHEESE & PISTACHIO CHEESECAKES

1 cup bread crumbs
1 cup finely ground unsalted pistachios
2 tblsp. melted butter
1/2-3/4 tsp. salt
1 tsp. ground black pepper
8 oz. cream cheese, softened
10 oz. soft goat cheese
2 eggs, beaten
2 tblsp. chopped fresh chives

Preheat oven to 350°F.; grease 36 mini muffin tins.
In large bowl combine bread crumbs, pistachios, melted butter, 1/2 tsp. salt, 1/2 tsp. pepper; stir until thoroughly combined. Spoon 1 tsp. of pistachio mixture into each tin; press down into bottoms of the tin.
Beat cream cheese until creamy. Add goat cheese and mix well. Add eggs; beat until well combined. Add chives and remaining 1/4 tsp. salt and pepper.
Spoon goat cheese mixture evenly into crusts in the muffin tins. Bake until puffed, about 15 mins. Let cheesecakes cool for 5 mins., then unmold. Serve warm. Great for a brunch!

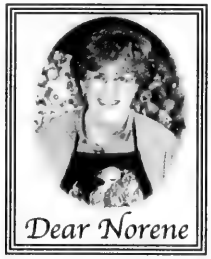
About Food



Welcome to summer! Why spend all day cooking over a hot stove when you can prepare delicious meals for family and friends on the barbecue grill? If you have grilling questions, call the experts on the Weber Grill-Line at 1-800-474-5568. They are also offering a free 40-page booklet, Entertaining in the Outdoor Room, and free CD, Light It Up! Music to Grill By.

The tips below and the delicious planked salmon recipe come from www.weber.com. Enjoy the joy of grilling!

Q: How long should I cook shish kabobs?

A: Cooking times depend somewhat on the type of meat and vegetables you are using. You can easily cook individual foods to their desired temperatures by putting vegetables, fruit and meat on separate skewers. Just place the skewers that require longer cooking time on the cooking grate first. If you want kabobs with different ingredients on them, you may want to blanch vegetables that require longer cooking times so they will be done at the same time as the meat. For perfectly grilled kabobs, trim excess fat from meat to prevent flare-ups-and if you're brushing kabobs with a marinade or sauce that contains sugar, brush it on only during the last 5 to 8 minutes so that it doesn't burn.

Tip: When threading ingredients on skewers, leave spaces between the pieces to ensure even grilling.

Q: Sometimes food sticks to the cooking grate. What can I do?

A: Using a marinade or lightly brushing the food with cooking oil just before you place it on the cooking grate will help keep it from sticking. Sometimes food sticks if you turn it too soon after putting it on the cooking grate. Wait a few minutes before turning so it will have time to properly sear.

CEDAR-PLANKED SALMON ON THE GRILL

Cooking Method – Charcoal: Indirect. Gas: Indirect/Medium.)

1 whole salmon fillet, 18 inches long (about 2½ pounds)
1 tbsp. lemon zest (zest of 1 lemon)
3 sprigs fresh dill, snipped salt and pepper
lemon wedges

Immerse an untreated, 20-inch cedar plank suitable for cooking use in water; soak at least 1 hour or up to 1 day. (Note: Make sure the plank you choose is virgin cedar. Buy one specially made for food preparation, usually sold in cookware stores.) Place salmon fillet, skin side down, on soaked plank. Sprinkle with lemon zest, dill, salt and pepper.

Place planked salmon in centre of cooking grate. Grill 25 to 30 minutes or until salmon is opaque in centre and flesh flakes easily with a fork. Garnish with lemon wedges. Makes 4 to 6 servings.

Tribute to ISRAEL

EXTRAORDINARY ACHIEVEMENTS

McGill University historian Gil Troy once said of Israel that it is the only country on earth that is incessantly "on probation." By that he meant, of course, that Israel is always having to justify its social, foreign and military policies to an unremittingly, even superciliously, critical and hostile world.

Israel is the only country that is perennially in the dock at the United Nations and its ancillary councils, assemblies, committees and commissions, accused, hypocritically and unfairly, by an automatic majority of Islamic bloc countries and their fellow travellers of all manner of "crimes."

The constant challenge to Israel's behaviour, the constant state of emotional and political siege under which Israel has had to live for all of its 55 years, have fostered, unfortunately, even among well-intentioned individuals in our community, a reflex of head-bowed, eyes-to-the-ground, self-conscience defence.

Though, like all countries, Israel is an imperfect one, there are no head-bowed articles in the following tribute to the Jewish state. Led by Troy, the following pages call our hearts, minds and consciences to the extraordinary nature and some of the extraordinary achievements of this tiny, precious country that was established only 55 years ago last month.

Jerusalem and Israel: inspiring studies in renewal and redemption

By GIL TROY

The death toll is devastating. Each casualty represents a family shattered, a world destroyed: Yardena Shoshani, 10 years old; Esther Ben Shimon, nine years old; Benjamin Yehezkel, eight years old – all shot just outside Jerusalem, the Jewish people's venerable capital. These three innocents are part of a broader tapestry of pain that includes 77 Jewish nurses, doctors and administrators who were slaughtered in one bloody ambush – out of a total of 1,256 Jews murdered in five months for the simple crime of wanting to live free Jewish lives in the Jewish homeland.

These names and numbers, which echo today's tragic headlines, are in fact from the bad old days – the five months that preceded the British withdrawal from Palestine in May 1948. Then as now, the Jews had accepted a painful, internationally brokered compromise, in that case the 1947 United Nations plan to partition Palestine. Then as now, the Arabs rejected the compromise and unleashed a brutal war of terror against Jewish children and Jewish parents, Jewish doctors and Jewish nurses, Jewish civilians and Jewish soldiers. Then, as now, Jerusalem was at the centre of the battle.

One hundred years ago, the ancient capital of the Jewish people was a dump.

Contemplating the bloody history of this most beautiful of cities, the capital of a country that dominates the Western imagination for better and for worse, is both depressing and exhilarating. The pain of yesteryear stings, even half a century later, especially because new tears are falling for new innocents, on both sides. And the fact that the fight continues between the same peoples over the same turf, is numbing. It is hard not to wonder, especially from the fleshpots of North America, why these people can't just get along.

But Jerusalem's story, like Israel's story, is inspiring as well. For starters, yesterday's march of misery ended, it has not been an unrelenting tale of woe. Even today, mired as we are in the conflict, tending as we do to impute to Palestinians a superhuman kind of willpower, we see that their bloodlust has subsided before – and will do so again. Yes, the Muslim cry of "kill the Jews: there is no punishment for killing Jews," provoked rioting in 1920 and 1929, in 1936 and 1947, and random acts of violence have repeatedly pockmarked Jerusalem's golden facade. But again and again, when faced with Jewish willpower, unity and strength, the Arabs retreated and the violence ended. And sometimes, what came in its wake was not simply a state of non-war, but true acts of neighbourliness.

Although too often stricken by war, Jerusalem remains a city of peace. In fact, the story of Jerusalem in the 20th century is a microcosm of the story of Israel, an inspiring case study of renewal, rebirth and redemption.

One hundred years ago, the ancient capital of the Jewish people was a dump. A town of 70,000 people – 45,000 largely destitute Jews and 25,000 largely destitute Arabs.

Theodor Herzl, the founder of modern Zionism, was delusive enough to envision a Jewish state 50 years down the line – but Jerusalem exhausted even his powers of imagination. "Shouts, smells, tawdry colours," he recorded in his diary in 1898, "people in rags crowding the narrow, airless streets, beggars, cripples, starveling children, screaming women, bellowing shopkeepers. The once-royal city had indeed sunk to the lowest depths."

Yet, the Zionist revival of Jerusalem mocked Herzl's words. A mere 20 years later, the city was progressing. British census reports would show that in Jerusalem, as happened elsewhere in Palestine, the Zionist boom attracted both Arab and Jewish immigrants. Between 1921 and 1933, 20,000 Jews immigrated to Jerusalem, as did more than 21,000 Arabs from as far away as Morocco, Algeria, Libya and Yemen.

Over the decades, Jerusalem would thrive economically, culturally, politically and architecturally. The little people of Jerusalem, the shopkeepers and the teachers, the artists and the bureaucrats, the businessmen and the charwomen, both Arab and Jewish, would be the true stars of the show.

But Jerusalem would also be blessed with remarkable leaders, such as Bernard Dov Joseph, who led the city through the 1948 siege; David Ben-Gurion, who made the city Israel's functional capital; and Yitzhak Rabin and Moshe Dayan, who helped reunite the city in 1967; and, most notably, Teddy Kollek.

Kollek is the mayor of the century. He polished the stones of Jerusalem while working to unite its people. As Martin Gilbert reports in his sweeping volume, Jerusalem in the Twentieth Century, during Kollek's tenure from 1965 to 1993, "facilities were provided for the Arab population of East Jerusalem beyond anything introduced under Jordanian rule [which lasted between 1948 and 1967], including sewage, a piped water system, clinics, parks and gardens. Access to Israeli hospitals was unrestricted." Moreover, the Western part of the city, and the Old City itself, sparkled, enhanced by steady economic development, as well as stirring acts of generosity from donors throughout the world. By 1994, there were 420,000 Jews living in this modern gleaming metropolis, in relative harmony with 155,000 Arabs.

'More than the story of the Arab-Israeli conflict'

The story of Jerusalem of Gold, Yerushalayim shel zahav, then, is the story of the Jewish state. It teaches us to hope for peace, to pray for good times, and to work to achieve a new and better reality. Even amid the frustrations of 2003, the Jewish people's 3,000-year-old capital retains its magic, just as even amid the tragedies of today, the Jewish people's 55-year-old state retains its allure. It is remarkable how the city thrived in the 20th century, despite being a flashpoint between Arab and Jew. In fact, it suggests that there were other forces shaping the Jewish state, and that there are other themes we can find when seeking to understand Israel.

Just as the story of Canada is more than the story of the French-English conflict and just as the story of the United States is more than the story of the white-black conflict, so, too, the story of Israel is more than the story of the Arab-Israeli conflict.

In contemplating the history of Israel beyond the conflict, Israel emerges as not just a great success story but a fascinating litmus test, an experiment illustrating some central lessons of 20th-century Western history. Israel's story teaches us that culture matters, democracy works, nationalism counts, immigration fuels growth and capitalism remains both a great social blessing and something of a curse, a facilitator of individual and national greatness as well as a social solvent.

One offshoot to the debate surrounding Harvard professor Samuel Huntington's provocative paradigm of a "clash of civilizations" is a debate about the relevance of culture to social strength and general progress.

In the 1960s and 1970s, academics succeeded in convincing many that it was all about politics, that countries needed effective leadership to prosper, and that, as Daniel Patrick Moynihan summarized the position – with which he disagreed – "politics can change a society and save it from itself." In contrast, Moynihan, Huntington and others began to argue that culture – meaning the values, attitudes, beliefs, orientations and underlying assumptions prevalent among people in a society – is the real key.

Certain cultures were indeed more likely than others to foster "human progress," which Huntington defines as "movement toward economic development and material well-being, social-economic equity, and political democracy."

In introducing a collection of articles he co-edited in 2000 called "Culture Matters," Huntington compared Ghana and South Korea. The two countries had similar-sized economies in the 1960s, but 30 years later, Ghana's economic output was a mere fraction of that of South Korea, which had become an industrial colossus. The difference, Huntington argued, lay in the fact South Koreans "valued thrift, investment, hard work, education, organization and discipline."

Even with Israel's current economic crisis, its trajectory from the austere 1950s to the sophistication and luxuries of today is remarkable. It is especially impressive considering Israel's limited natural resources, its relatively small population, and its hostile and underdeveloped neighbours.

Israelis have wisely built a society more oriented toward the West than the East. They developed a culture that prizes education, hard work, ambition, vision, creative problem-solving and an entrepreneurial spirit. As a result, the days of "tsena," when it was eggplant for breakfast, more eggplant for lunch, and eggplant leftovers for dinner, are long gone. Israel is not only an impressive high technology centre – even after the most recent economic crash – it is a leading source of all kinds of scientific and medical innovations, the result of its many universities churning out a smart and sophisticated workforce.

Democracy – in all its splendour, and all its complexity – has helped facilitate the country's economic and social progress. At first blush, this statement is difficult to believe. For starters, in the 1970s leading thinkers were predicting the demise of democracy and warning about how ineffectual and weak a democratic system could be. Moreover, Israel has developed a fractious, polarized democracy, with too many parties and too many shrill and unreasonable politicians. The yelling and backbiting that occurs in the Knesset is an embarrassment to the Jewish state and the Jewish people.

Yet democracy – thank goodness – is not just a question of what goes on in a country's parliament. The whole democratic package – the commitment to liberty and equality, the respect for individuals, the reverence for the rule of law, the right to dissent and to debate, and the freedoms of press, religion, and speech – enhances social and political strength and has helped Israel advance.

Yes, the arguments among politicians are often hysterical. Yes, the challenges often seem overwhelming. But the way Israel has sustained its half-century of democracy, especially under unprecedented outside pressure, should make it the toast of the Western world and a model for humanity. In Israel, we can see how culture matters and politics helps – that Israeli democracy has thrived in a cultural soil that welcomes democracy, and that democratic institutions and ideals have reinforced that cultural orientation.

The success of Israel, the realization of the Zionist dream, is also a tribute to the positive power of nationalism. In our cynical, post-modernist world, it is easy to caricature nationalism as fanatical and narrow-minded and to dismiss patriotism as provincialism. But for all the examples of nationalist excess in the 20th century, the era also offered many examples of nationalist success. Nationalism is not only about one group of people feeling superior to others. It's also about a country being able to give individuals a feeling of community and being able to mobilize that community to accomplish together what people could not accomplish on their own.

Surprisingly – or perhaps not so surprisingly considering human nature and our need for communal identity – many of the great scientific breakthroughs in the 20th century, from the cure for polio to the fight against AIDS, had a nationalist component. In the United States, nationalism does not just entail Fourth of July rhetoric and huge military budgets. It has also led to the Marshall Plan for Europe, the fight against poverty at home, an entrepreneurial dynamism that mixes the zeal to make a buck with the desire to build America, and a spirit of giving and concern for others that buttresses altruistic instincts with national pride. The nation may not be the only form of communal organization, nor necessarily the best, but it is the central organizing principle in the modern world and can produce a lot of good.

Contrary to the many libels and smears surrounding it, the saga of Zionism has also marked a proud chapter in the history of nationalism. Medinat Yisrael, the state of Israel, is a remarkable experiment in national rejuvenation – of building Eretz Yisrael, the land of Israel, and reorienting and energizing Am Yisrael, the nation of Israel.

The early Zionists dreamed of a new Jewish commonwealth that would be a boon to humanity, not just to the Jewish people. Considering its small size and relative youth, the State of Israel has a pretty impressive track record so far.

In the 1950s, the kibbutz ideal offered a model of humane and freedom-loving socialism that contrasted with oppressive, Soviet-style Communism. By the 1960s the representatives of this young, fledgling state were working with developing African societies less fortunate than their own. In the energy-stretched 1970s, Israeli solar power offered alternative visions of how to live and consume. By the 1980s, Tzahal, the Israel Defence Forces, was already positioning itself as a world leader in search-and-rescue and in pioneering mobile medical units so that when there were earthquakes in Turkey, atrocities in Rwanda, bombings in Tanzania and Kenya, IDF soldiers were mobilized to save lives. In the 1990s, Israeli technological, medical and pharmacological miracles helped transform the world, shrinking the world through innovations such as "ICQ," an online chat technology, and saving lives with cutting-edge brain research at Tel Aviv University, innovative emergency room techniques at Hadassah Hospital and amazing cures developed in private labs.

The early Zionists dreamed of a new Jewish commonwealth that would be a boon to humanity, not just to the Jewish people.

Israeli innovations and Israeli success also prove that immigration can be a positive and creative force that fuels growth. It is noteworthy that in a country such as the United States, the first time an immigrant ascends to a particular position, people cheer. But Israel is such a melting pot that when Yitzhak Rabin became the first native-born prime minister, it was cause for celebration. Israel has welcomed the surviving remnants of Hitler's Holocaust, 800,000 refugees from various Muslim countries, 20,000 Ethiopians and one million Russians. Each time, it's been a win-win story, as Israel has offered desperate individuals refuge but also benefited from their skills, culture and ambition.

Israel has been able to absorb so many immigrants because, as a capitalist country, it has, overall, enjoyed remarkable growth in the last half-century. As in the United States, Israeli society demonstrates how capitalism can harness individual skill for the good of the collective, as people enticed by the rewards at the end of the rainbow have helped build the modern, industrial, sophisticated society that Israel is today.

Alas, as in the United States, that capitalist culture emerges as a social solvent, often undermining a sense of intimate community in the zeal to empower and energize individuals. Israel's story proves that free enterprise is good, but it is not without its costs. The challenge of the 21st century will be to continue to build on the good while managing the costs.

These days, especially in Canada and Europe, it is far too fashionable to dismiss Western, American-style values, without really thinking about the alternatives. We live in a Manichean upside-down world that is hypercritical of Western mistakes and often blind to the drawbacks of other societies. We need to remind ourselves again and again that just because many people criticize us, just because we are in the embattled minority, does not mean that we are wrong.

To appreciate Israel's role as a western, democratic, capitalist country helping to build the world, even as it absorbs and enlists both immigrants and native Israelis, is to look at a fuller picture of Israel than we normally see. This is not to say we should view Israel through rose-coloured glasses. Rather, we should use a wide-angle lens.

As we toast Israel in its 55th year, we cannot just make it about Arabs or Palestinians. We toast the builders of Israel, the dreamers of Israel, and the unsung heroes of Israel, the everyday men and women who have made this miracle of a country, strong, proud, humane and free.

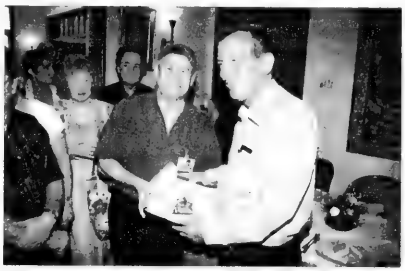
Israel: You have to visit to understand

By KEN BOSHCOFF

Like most Canadians, the Middle East has had very little direct effect on my life. I certainly hadn't given it as much thought as other issues I must deal with as mayor of Thunder Bay. But no longer. As a result of an invitation I received from the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), Ontario region, to join a recent mayors' mission to Israel, I now understand the Middle East in a different way.



Mayor Boshcoff meets Tel Aviv Mayor Ron Hulda'i

In Israel, history is measured in thousands of years. How could we not be touched when visiting Capernaum, the northern Israeli town that was once the Ministry of Jesus? We were in awe as our guide pointed out the window of our bus and said, "You see that field? That is where David slew Goliath." And even if you are not religious, walking into the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, the Stations of the Cross along the Via Dolorosa – following in the path of Jesus – all this has an incredible impact.

And the contrast! It was not uncommon to see young men and women on leave from their army units, carrying their M-16s. How young these soldiers were – teenagers fighting for the very survival of their land.

The terrorist suicide bombing campaign has left Israel scarred but unbowed. The resiliency of its economy and its people proved to us that terrorism is no solution to the problems of the Middle East. In meetings with Israel's Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz, Finance Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, Industry Minister Ehud Olmert and mayors from cities both small and large, the need for peace was a constant in each and every conversation.

When you are in Israel, you begin to understand the situation in ways that our media does not convey. Canada is a big country. Borders with other countries or even provinces (or municipalities!) can be far away. Here, everything is close. When we visited the Canada Centre in the northern Israeli town of Metulla, we stood on one side of the road gazing across the street at the border with Lebanon. We clearly saw the yellow flags of Hezbollah. One of our participants indicated that without too much effort, he could throw a rock from Metulla into Lebanese territory. While walking through the streets of West Jerusalem, we needed only look a few yards ahead to the Old City, which is part of the West Bank.

As we drove along Israeli roads and highways, we had an opportunity to see the controversial fence that is being erected by Israeli authorities to help stop Palestinian terrorist attacks. We were moved by the murals painted along the fences. They were of the scenery on the other side – a clear hope that these fences will be torn down one day.

And Israel is a land of hope. One day we were taken to the town of Rehovot, where we attended a kindergarten class that has absorbed dozens of young Ethiopian Jews. Israel helped bring their families from Ethiopia, accepting them as full citizens. Israel works hard to ensure that the large number of Jews coming from all over the world, be it Ethiopia or the former Soviet Union, find a comfortable place in their religious homeland.

On another day, we attended a Jewish-Palestinian Co-existence Centre in the heart of Jaffa. There we saw Israeli and Palestinian children participating in music classes, drama and educational events. May this hope be realized in our day.

We ended our week with a visit to Yad Vashem, Israel's Holocaust Museum and Memorial. Particularly striking was the children's memorial. In the darkness, candlelight is refracted by mirrors thousands of times. You hear the intonation of the names of 1.5 million Jewish children murdered by the Nazis. You move through this memorial with tears in your eyes, but as you exit, you face a vibrant Jerusalem, where Jews need no longer fear extermination. This is the existential reason for the state of Israel.

Boshcoff thanking Finance Minister Benjamin Netanyahu for speaking to the Canadian visitors. [CJC photos]

We all came away with a deep understanding of the importance of Israel to the Jewish people, its desire for peace and its hopes for the future. These are lessons worth learning and messages worth sharing.

Ken Boshcoff is the mayor of Thunder Bay, Ontario, and the president of the Association of Ontario Municipalities. He joined 20 other Ontario mayors and municipal officials on a trip to Israel in mid-May sponsored by Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region.

The right of return, from Israel's viewpoint

Due to the fact that the Palestinians have claimed a "right of return" for Palestinian refugees to within Israel's borders, it is vital that we remind the international community of the facts in this complex matter and of the serious implications for Israel if it accepts responsibility or recognizes this Palestinian claim.

The Palestinian refugee problem did not spring from a vacuum. The immediate cause of the problem was the refusal of the Arabs to accept UN General Assembly Resolution 181 (the Partition Plan) in 1947 and, consequently, their initiation of the war that led to Israel's independence. During that war, many Arabs living in the battle zones abandoned their homes, whether they were following calls from the Arab leaders, afraid of the fighting or apprehensive over their fate under a Jewish regime. If the war had not been forced upon Israel by the various Arab countries and the local Arab population, the refugee problem would not exist.

The Arab states, excluding Jordan, made sure to perpetuate the refugee problem in order to attempt to destroy Israel. The refugees were placed in crowded camps, where they lived in poverty and despair, and no attempt was made to absorb them into society or to provide for their welfare.

Resolution 194 was adopted in 1948 by the UN General Assembly and by its nature is not obligatory. In addition, the following points about this resolution should be noted:

• A "right" of return is nowhere mentioned in the document. Quite the opposite: the resolution makes the return of refugees conditional on the existence of certain prerequisites – that these refugees are interested in living in peace with their neighbours, and that the return of the refugees will take place "at the earliest practicable date." Experience has shown that this population is not interested in living peacefully with its Jewish neighbours and that, given the current demographic and geographic conditions, it is not practicable for such a large number of refugees to return to the area.

• Resolution 194 uses the general term "refugees" and does not relate specifically to Arab refugees. This differs from earlier drafts of the resolution that were not accepted.

• The resolution states that compensation (for refugees who choose not to return, or whose property has been destroyed or damaged) will be provided by "the governments or authorities responsible." The requirement to provide compensation does not specifically make mention of Israel. Furthermore, the wording referring in the plural to governments and authorities alike is inconsistent with the Palestinian claim that the burden of compensation falls solely upon Israel.

• Article 11, which deals with the subject of return and compensation, is but one of 15 articles that make up Resolution 194, which refers more generally to the subject of the Conciliation Committee. The Palestinians selectively demand implementation of only those clauses that are consistent with their interests.

• Resolution 194 uses the general term "refugees" and does not relate specifically to Arab refugees.

Since Israel is neither responsible for the creation of the refugee problem nor for its perpetuation, it cannot declare, even as a gesture, its responsibility for this problem, since such a declaration would have far-reaching implications:

• It would encourage the Palestinian right of return to areas that are part of the State of Israel. The arrival of millions of Arabs in Israel would effectively end its independent existence as the Jewish state.

• It would be used by the refugees as a basis for their claims against Israel for compensation for lost property, as well as the suffering they have undergone for the last 55 years.

• It would facilitate claims by the refugees' "host countries" for compensation from Israel for the cost of "hosting the refugees, when these same countries are in fact responsible for creating the problem to begin with.

It should be stressed that many Jews were forced out of Arab countries, leaving behind vast property and wealth for which they were never compensated. Israel took them in and integrated them into Israeli society. Furthermore, Israel never renounced its right to submit claims regarding these Jewish refugees from Arab countries.

A Jewish-Arab coexistence project grows

By ANNETTE YOUNG
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Nesreen Basheer says that for her and her nine-year-old daughter Mona, participating in the program was a small but defiant gesture.

"It is not logical being here, I know, but we had to keep coming," said the soft-spoken, east Jerusalem Arab mother of five, explaining why she had joined some 30 Arab and Jewish parents and 130 children at a coexistence workshop organized by the Bible Lands Museum in Jerusalem.

On one particular day, the same week as the Haifa suicide bombing this spring, it had been particularly difficult for Nesreen to bring Mona along. "She wanted to come. All I kept on saying... is, 'How can I look them in the eye?'

Arab and Israeli children at the Museum

"They want to live here in peace" she said gesturing to the Israeli parents, "and we want to live in peace. And we have to get on together. This is the road we have to keep walking on, no matter what happens."

Called The Image of Abraham, the program, which began in 1998, encourages schoolchildren aged nine and 10 to explore their shared religious heritage through a series of games, guided tours and creative workshops.

Following its success, the museum decided this year to extend the annual eight-week program to include parents. The turnout was much higher than expected, with 30 to 40 parents showing up for each session.

"There was just as much enthusiasm and curiosity among the parents as there was among the children," said Yehuda Kaplan, the head of the museum's education department.

"We don't expect a major breakthrough; we're not that naive, but it's a start," he said cautiously.

In another first, two Jerusalem schools also took part this year. Security fears had prevented such participation in the past.

Along with their own teachers, and museum volunteers who speak both Hebrew and Arabic, children from Paula Ben-Gurion school in Rehavia and the El-Tzal'a school in Jabel Mukaber in east Jerusalem researched their family tree to find the name "Abraham" or "Ibrahim."

They also studied the cultures of the ancient Near East, and traced common elements in the Arab and Jewish heritage, including scripts, language, customs and faiths.

The nine- to 10-year-old age group was chosen, museum program director Amanda Weiss explained, because the children would be old enough to grasp the historical perspective of learning the Bible, but "young enough to be open and eager to take on a challenge like this."

Following the success of previous years, the museum decided to create a similar series of accompanying workshops and tours for the parents.

As their children enthusiastically played tag in the museum's courtyard, yelling out cries of encouragement in Arabic and Hebrew, exchanges between the parents seemed to be limited to polite inquiries about each other's offspring, especially at first.

"Language is more of a problem for us than for the children," admitted 36-year-old Michal Tannenbaum whose daughter Shira attends Paula Ben-Gurion school and signed up for the workshop. "But it is a really nice atmosphere for the children, and it is important for them to be here and break the equation that the Arabs are enemies.

"I grew up being frightened but nothing compared to Shira's childhood," she said.

Parents spoke of children who were nervous and terrified at the first session – to the point of crying in some cases – and were now exchanging phone numbers and hugging each other as each session ended.

One Israeli mother spoke of the joy she felt when she was greeted by a kiss from an Arab mother at the beginning of the day's session.

As for Shira and Mona, both just simply enjoyed the opportunity to make new friends. "It's great," Shira said with a grin, while Mona shyly agreed.

"This project is about building communication and trust where none exists," Weiss said. "It is a very delicate project, trying not to tread on anybody's pain and suffering."

The museum has worked hard to convince schools, teachers and parents that the program's aim is not to proselytize, and that cultural identity on either side will be respected.

Now the only complaints the museum faces are that the program is not long enough, that just as the ice is broken, especially between the parents, the sessions come to an end and there is no follow-up.

"We don't have the funding to carry out a long-term study on the connections that have been made," Weiss said, adding that the museum is aware of friendships that have resulted and continued.

The project, whose annual budget is about $42,000 (US), is supported by the Abraham Fund, private donations and by the Jerusalem Foundation. But like many Israeli programs that rely heavily on charity, it is under threat from a worsening world economy and the ongoing intifadah.

"The museum is the perfect place for this kind of project because it is about our shared history and heritage," said Weiss, who is desperately seeking donations for the year ahead, with the intention of extending its adult program.

"But it is getting harder and harder. Unfortunately, it is not seen as a project of primary need. Yet if we don't learn to live together in peaceful coexistence then we don't have a chance for peace in this region at this point in time."

A desert flower

By EDGAR ASHER
CJN Israel Bureau

A wind of change is blowing across the Negev as Israel's Bedouin community of 120,000, which represents 25 per cent of the population of the southern region of the country, begins to successfully integrate into the Israeli educational system.

In less than a year, Ben-Gurion University of the Negev will graduate Israel's first Bedouin woman doctor, Rania Al-Oqbi, 23, who says she will dedicate her expertise to helping improve the health of Bedouin women.

Al-Oqbi's achievement over the past six years mirrors the overall change in statistics in the university. In the current academic year, 423 Bedouin students of both sexes are involved in some aspect of university life. Eight years ago, there were no Bedouin students in the university. Today 27 Bedouin women students are studying for either a first or a second degree, and another Bedouin woman, Heba Abu-Kaf, has also started studying medicine.

The revolution that enabled Al-Oqbi to enter the university was made possible by a soft-spoken Israeli Arab, Dr. Riad Agbaria, who was born in Um Al-Fahm in the centre of Israel. Agbaria heads the university's department of clinical pharmacology and it was his vision to encourage young Bedouins to improve their own standard of education and, in turn, be instrumental in helping raise living, health and educational standards in this depressed sector of the Israeli Arab community.

Agbaria describes his mission to educate young Bedouins as a seed turning into a flower. When he switches on his computer the first thing visible on his screen is the adage, "Sow a seed and the earth will yield you a flower."

"Rania is a by-product of my connection with the Bedouin community," Agbaria said. "In 1994, I returned from the United States after completing my post-doctorate degree. I was told by the university's genetic institute that the highest rate of growth and [baby] deliveries was being seen in the Bedouin community. Number of [Bedouin] nurses – zero. Number of physiotherapists – zero. Number of female physicians – zero. Number of lab workers – zero.

"When I started teaching at the university, I would look around and see that none of the students were Bedouin. I asked myself why. I received my PhD at this university, so I know the teachers weren't discriminating between Jews and Arabs and neither was the university.

"There was nothing wrong with the university. [The problem] was beyond the university, so I concluded that it must come from the Bedouin side. There was a bad educational system in the Bedouin sector… This meant that there was no chance of Bedouin youngsters going into the professions – like medicine. The other problem was that the Bedouin community did not want to send their girls to study in any university other than Ben-Gurion."

Agbaria spoke to the university's president, Prof. Avishay Braverman, and its dean, Shrager Segal, to tell them there was something wrong.

"Braverman said, 'What are the numbers? How many in the nursing school?'

"I said, zero.

"'I don't believe you Riad,' Braverman said. 'Let me check these numbers.'"

The university president came back and said that the next year, it would be possible to have five Bedouin students each in medicine, nursing and physiotherapy.

Agbaria felt this was not affirmative action because there were no qualified students to choose from. He decided to start a new program to prepare the students for university. Within 24 hours, he delivered a comprehensive program to Braverman with a price tag of $50,000 to start. By the next day, the president had raised the necessary funds and Agbaria could start his project, called the Negev Medical Cadets. It is a health science enrichment program offered at some Bedouin high schools.

'Most educated Bedouin women are beginning to distance themselves from the more severe Bedouin traditions'

The program would include regular visits to the Soroka Medical Centre, so that students could help in the hospitals' various departments. Not only would this prepare potential students for university, Agbaria also thought that once the students were involved in a program, their parents would not strongly object to their carrying on up the medical education ladder. This was particularly important for girls, because Bedouin culture is in favour of girls staying close to home, marrying within their clan and bringing up a family.

The funding provided by the program would enable the Bedouin students to attend university for free. The community's poverty would otherwise be an almost complete bar to further education.

It was through this program that Rania Al-Oqbi met Agbaria. Al-Oqbi's mother believed education is essential for all Bedouin girls. Furthermore, for most of her life Al-Oqbi had lived in a single-parent family because her mother was separated from Al-Oqbi's father, an unusual situation for Bedouins.

"My sister gained her BA degree at Ben-Gurion University. Then she started to teach in a high school in [the Bedouin town of] Rahat," Al-Oqbi said. "The girls in the school started to talk to her about their problems. How some of them were beaten and sometimes raped at home. When she heard these stories, she decided to stop being a teacher and study social work because she felt that this way she could more positively help these girls."

Al-Oqbi was doing well in Agbaria's project and he felt she had the potential to study medicine. Her university entrance results were a little below the figures needed to study medicine, but Agbaria realized that this was because of the poor high school education in the Bedouin towns rather than a reflection of Al-Oqbi's ability. He persuaded the university to accept her as a medical student.

"When I look back at my first year, I realize I was very nervous all the time because I was afraid not to succeed. I thought that if I failed, they would not accept anyone else. I had a big responsibility to justify Agbaria's faith in me," said Al-Oqbi.

She need not have worried because after her first year, her marks were always better than average.

Is Al-Oqbi now optimistic that there will be a change in entrenched Bedouin attitudes to education, especially education for girls?

"The minute a Bedouin daughter says to her father, 'I am now studying, working, independent. I want to choose the man that I will marry,' the father will say no. He will say, 'It is my job to say who you will marry.' If a woman goes against her father's wishes, she really stands the risk of being killed. Generally she can only marry within her own tribe. We go out and we study and we are very influenced by the Jewish community. Some will say it is a positive influence and some will say it is negative.

"I will be a doctor soon and I want to be responsible for my own life. I want to decide where to live and who I will marry. It's a conflict and very frustrating. Nobody has done this before. My mother thought when she was my age that this tradition might die out, but it hasn't. Most educated Bedouin men agree that this attitude to women is outdated, but when you ask them if it would be all right for their sisters to marry outside their tribe you receive a firm no."

Most educated Bedouin women are beginning to distance themselves from the more severe Bedouin traditions. "On one hand the university is a big matchmaker," Al-Oqbi said. "It's the only place you can meet people. We don't go out to the cinema or restaurants or any other place."

Al-Oqbi does not have a life outside medicine. Because of strict Bedouin taboos on the activities permitted to women, she is in a sense confined to the university. She cannot go to an outside restaurant or to a movie.

"I spend my free time volunteering in the labour room, because I don't have anything else to do. I cannot go against these traditions, because as a doctor-to-be, I want people to respect me. If I do what I want, they won't respect me. Unfortunately, I am the sort of person who wants to change things; however, I have to think very carefully about the consequences of my actions. I have to behave as people will expect me to."

Al-Oqbi wants to be the first Bedouin gynecologist in the Negev and improve the health of Bedouin women. Her understanding of the Bedouin culture and language may be the catalyst needed to bring the Bedouin women into the 21st century. She is realizes that she is paving the way for other Bedouin girls to take up medicine. As she completes her sixth and final year, a second Bedouin woman student has just been accepted to study medicine at Ben-Gurion University Medical School.

When asked if she would like to go abroad after qualifying to study further and work, Al-Oqbi replied, "My mother is not very happy to think that I might study abroad after I qualify. If I did, and it's a big 'if,' I would always come back."

Our holiday in Israel – tears of sadness and joy

By MENDEL GREEN

After having coffee with Etty Lothan, chair of the Tel Aviv Foundation and assistant to the mayor of Tel Aviv, Ron Huldai, my wife Helen came home excited and announced that we had put off our trip to Israel too long. Over the years, Helen and I had taken many holidays in Israel, but we had not gone for a while because of the present circumstances.

We flew to Israel last November. and what happened during our 10-day holiday there changed our lives. There wasn't one hour that went by when we didn't cry and then immediately see something that made us happy.

We left Air Canada from Toronto at midnight and arrived about 5:30 p.m. Israeli time the next day. We went straight to our hotel and checked in. We were hungry and decided to go to a fish restaurant where we had eaten the last time we were in Israel. The restaurant was so good that we ate there three times during our last trip, and the chef even took us into the kitchen and taught us how to make great fish.

It was still in business. After being seated, I told the waiter about our cooking experience during our last visit. When he heard we were on a holiday, he left the table and returned with the entire staff, who hugged us and said thanks for visiting the country. Helen and I started to cry. We had a great dinner and went back to our hotel to sleep.

The next day, as it is our routine when we're on holiday, we wanted to go for a long walk. We were assured by the hotel staff everything was safe and we walked all the way to Jaffa. On the way, we stopped at the sight of a bombed-out disco that had been hit by a suicide bomber. Fresh flowers surrounded a stone monument with the names, in both Hebrew and Russian, of the 22 young men and women who were killed. Obviously, someone is bringing flowers every morning.

The monument's engraving, "We will keep on dancing," shook us. Once again, Helen and I started to cry. The statement made us understand the strength of our Israeli brothers and sisters. We left the monument with pride and great respect for Israelis.

We then entered Jaffa, a beautiful ancient seaport and an Israeli Arab town. The last time we were there, thousands of people were on the streets, its shops were flourishing and everything was beautiful. That day, we saw no one. Most of the shops were closed and we were the only tourists. We went to a little coffee shop and were welcomed by the Arab owner, who thanked us for coming. He said he had not seen a tourist in a long time.

'We saw three beautiful parks sponsored by Torontonians'

The next day, Etty Lothan picked us up and showed us the real Tel Aviv. We saw Jewish neighbourhoods that were shantytowns. She showed us shelters for abused women and took us to day-care centres where the only hot meal children got was at the centre. We also returned to Jaffa to visit a beautiful day-care centre that caters to both Jewish and Arab children. The principal is Arab, the teachers are both Jews and Arabs, and the children play together. Arab and Israeli mothers sit and drink tea together, and they watch their beautiful children. Helen commented how sad it was that Jews and Arabs can't learn from the peace and harmony at this centre.

During our stay in Tel Aviv, Helen and I were both surprised at how many prominent Toronto Jews have made donations to these day-care centres, shelters and parks. We saw three beautiful parks sponsored by Torontonians. We were so proud. Our community has truly made a difference in Tel Aviv.

The next day, we went to visit a Cobra helicopter base. It was amazing. The helicopters were lined up in a row, armed to the teeth. Each carried four missiles and 600 machine gun shells. It was an awesome sight on the runway. We felt so proud of Israel. We were taken inside the command centre, where we met distinguished young pilots, both male and female, who live on the base and are on duty 24 hours a day in case they are needed. We witnessed some highly sophisticated electronics and technology of war.

We were then shown a video of the killing of two Israeli soldiers by an Arab mob in Ramallah in October 2000. We saw the police officer who beat them up and threw them out a window of the police station to the mob below. We saw the officer show the mob the blood on his hands. The mob cheered as they beat and stabbed the two young men. We wept silently. A short time later, a Cobra helicopter flew to Ramallah and fired a missile that went through the small window where the police officer had stood, and it blew the whole building up. I couldn't believe how the missile changed direction three times, yet somehow found its way into the building through the small window. Helen and I were so sad, and at the same time so proud of the Israeli helicopter pilots who carried out this mission with such precision.

The next day, we went to Yad Vashem, where we were shown a new exhibit about children of the Holocaust. It had colouring books, toys, etc. It was quite moving. The director of the museum told us a story about a doll that we noticed hanging on a wall. It had belonged to a little girl in a concentration camp. Throughout her time in the camp, she carried the doll with her all the time. When the camp was liberated, she carried it with her out of the camp and had slept with the doll every night since. (She believed the doll saved her.)

Tribute to Israel

'On Shabbat, the beach was packed with thousands of Israelis'

When Hillary Rodham Clinton visited Yad Vashem a few years ago, this woman was asked to place her doll in the museum, but she refused. She just could not see herself without the doll, since it had been with her every day of her life since she left the camp. She relented after a few weeks and loaned the doll to Yad Vashem for Clinton's visit. After the visit, she went to Yad Vashem to get the doll back, as she could not be without it. The museum again asked her to leave the doll, but she refused. After a few months, she decided that maybe it was a good thing to donate it to the exhibit. She wrote the doll a letter to say good bye and tell it how she felt.

When we heard the story, Helen and I started weeping. We have been blessed with eight grandchildren and each of them slept with a little doll. Somehow, we understood how this woman felt. It made us understand the importance of never forgetting the Holocaust and the importance of Yad Vashem to Israel, the Jewish people and the world.

'Helen broke down one day and cried, wondering what Israel will do without tourists'

Each afternoon, we would go out on the promenade beside the beach and have coffee. The restaurants were full of Israelis. We felt upset because we didn't see any tourists. Helen broke down one day and cried, wondering what Israel will do without tourists. This happened on a Friday afternoon before Shabbat. Just at that moment, a truck loaded with chairs and tables pulled up near us. We were told it was all part of getting ready for Shabbat. We didn't understand, but the next day, it became clear what was meant.

On Shabbat, the beach was packed with thousands of Israelis. The restaurants were full and you had to wait for a table. The Israelis were so proud, dressed – and undressed – so beautifully on the beach. I have never seen such confidence. Helen and I just sat in awe of their beauty. In Canada, we had read of concerns about terrorism, but the situation in Israel has made these great people resolved not to let the suicide bombers change their lives. We felt very at ease seated with them in their coffee shops and felt no fear whatsoever.

Strangers, cab drivers and friends made us understand how courageous Israelis are. Despite the intifadah, they have lives to live and children to raise. They are brave, tough and smile in spite of their situation. We learned, however, that they feel abandoned by the Jews of the Diaspora who don't come to visit anymore. We should not forsake them. You would not believe how much our visit meant to everyone, friend and stranger alike. I urge all of you to visit Israel. They need us, and, frankly, we need them.

On our last day in Israel, Mayor Huldai asked us to attend a birthday celebration for the 75th birthday of former Tel Aviv mayor Shlomo Lahat. When we went to city hall and took our seats, a polite gentleman approached us and said we were sitting in the wrong place. It was former prime minister Ehud Barak and his wife. Helen and I couldn't stop smiling. In that room were many heroes who had led Israel over the years. We were participating in a truly historic event and felt immensely proud to be with these great people.

We have decided to go back to Israel for a holiday as soon as possible and recognize we must continue to support Israel – now more than ever before. We are full of love and pride when it comes to Israel. Without Israel, we Jews in Canada will never be able to walk with pride.

"Next Year in Jerusalem!"

The IDF's code of conduct needs wider publicity

By CARL ALPERT

A hostile press and foes of Israel frequently describe Israeli soldiers as cruel and bloodthirsty, venting their animosity on helpless Arab civilians. Scant mention is made, of course, of Palestinian suicide bombers who deliberately seek out the maximum number of Israeli civilians they can kill.

It is time that official Israel policy regarding actions by its men in uniform is made more widely known. A code of ethics is posted in military barracks, and by way of emphasis and reminder, a special brochure has recently been distributed internally among all the members of the Israel Defence Forces.

In one special section, soldiers are reminded that their operations must be carried out with full regard for human values, something that has always been the IDF's policy. In their relations with the Palestinians, soldiers are told to bear in mind that every individual is entitled to respect, regardless of origin, religion, nationality or sex.

Soldiers who serve in the West Bank and Gaza are reminded that they represent the State of Israel, and as such they bear the responsibility of behaving in a manner befitting the spirit of the IDF and its values.

There are specific guidelines governing their behaviour at all times. With respect to the dignity of the civilians, three points are made:

A lighter moment at an officer induction ceremony. [Israpet]

- Contact with the local population shall be in the line of duty only.
- Care should be taken to avoid any utterances or behaviour that might cause offence to the local population. Consideration should be given to the feelings and traditions of the inhabitants.
- Wild behaviour toward, or humiliation of, the population is to be strictly avoided. Special care should be taken to prevent harm to women, the aged, the ill and children.

It is true that scattered instances of violent behaviour by Israeli soldiers have been reported, but the press seldom follows up these reports with the news that such soldiers are punished, and some are even sent to prison.

A spokesperson for the army has observed that no one has ever seen Chechnyan children approach a Russian tank, because they know they would be killed on the spot. Yet TV reports constantly show Palestinian youth, unafraid, hurling rocks at Israeli tanks, because they know the Israelis will not shoot them.

The code of ethics also says that no damage shall be caused to any property of the population in the West Bank and Gaza unless operational activities require it. In such cases, care should be taken to minimize the damage. Pillage or theft of Palestinian property is forbidden and constitute serious criminal offences for which the offender will receive severe punishment. It must be noted that the destruction of specific homes is part of a necessary policy to prevent the smuggling of arms and to serve as a deterrent to terrorist activity.

The regulations insist that examination of individuals must respect their dignity. Women are to be physically searched only by women soldiers.

Overall, the basic principle behind the IDF guidelines is that the normal existence of the population shall not be unnecessarily interrupted. Obviously, when the Palestinians declare war against Israel and take actions that require a military response, they are, in effect, undermining their own normalcy.

The regulations also state that properly identified medical personnel and ambulances bearing patients in critical condition shall be permitted to pass checkpoints without unnecessary delay. It is no secret that terrorists have sought to exploit this policy.

Journalists, Israeli soldiers are warned, must be treated with respect and patience, and permitted to fulfill their journalistic functions, except when areas have been proclaimed as off-limits for military reasons. Further, soldiers may not enter delicate installations such as holy places, schools and hospitals, except where there is suspicion that they are being used for hostile purposes. Entrance to such places shall be only with polite and respectful behaviour.

Other regulations deal with care and treatment of wounded civilians and prisoners. It is forbidden to utilize civilians as human shields. Representatives of the Red Cross and the United Nations shall be permitted passage, except where there may be suspicion that these are being used as cover by hostile elements.

Israel soldiers are for the most part not professional men of war. They are the youth and the citizens of the country, decent men and women.

The code of ethics is to remind them of how they must behave, even in times of stress.

Carl Alpert, a syndicated columnist in Haifa, has been commenting on Israeli affairs for more than half a century.

Tribute to Israel

A Jerusalem Primer

By ROUHAMA DANTO

Zion was created first. Around it clung the earth until the very borders of the world. – Rashi on Yoma 54

In the Jewish tradition, the rock of the foundation (Even Hashtiyah) on Mount Moriah in Jerusalem is the point of origin of creation.

With a recorded history of some 4,000 years, Jerusalem has been more familiar to more people for a longer period of time than any other place on earth.

It is a fascinating, charming city sitting high amid the Judean Hills in the centre of Israel.

This is the city of David, who unified the country in the 10th century BCE and proclaimed it its capital.

This is the city of King Solomon's Temple.

This is the city where the giant prophets Isaiah and Jeremiah uttered thoughts that influenced the morals and religious attitudes of half the human race.

This was the scene of Jesus' last ministry, and it was here that he was crucified.

Muslims, too, consider Jerusalem holy, believing it to be the site from which Mohammed ascended to heaven.

The history of Jerusalem from earliest times is the history of man: a history of war and peace, of greatness and misery, of lofty wisdom and of blood flowing in the gutters.

But the golden thread, the consistent theme running through that history, is its unshakable association with the Jewish people.

The story of this association was repeatedly interrupted by a succession of conquerors: Egyptians, Assyrians, Babylonians, Persians, Greeks, Romans, Muslim Arabs, Crusaders, Mamelukes, Ottomans, British and Jordanians (who ruled a part of the city between 1948 and 1967).

Yet throughout the 3,000 years since King David made Jerusalem the seat of Israeli sovereignty, the spiritual attachment of the Jews to the city has remained unbroken.

Despite the many rulers Jerusalem has known, only for the Jews has it been the capital of an independent nation living in this land. It has been a capital three times in its history: from 1000 BCE until the destruction of the First Temple in 587 BCE, from 515 BCE until the destruction of the Second Temple in 70 CE and from the establishment of the State of Israel in 1948. At all other times, Jerusalem was ruled by foreigners. It has never been the capital of any other nation.

The story of the Jewish attachment to Jerusalem does not have a parallel in any other city in the world. As the former mayor of Jerusalem Teddy Kollek said: "No other city has played such a dominant role in the history, culture, religion and consciousness of a people as has Jerusalem in the life of Jewry and Judaism."

The following are some examples of Jerusalem's importance to the Jews:

• When the land was divided among the tribes, Jerusalem was not assigned to any tribe. It belonged to the entire nation and its holiness was continuous and eternal (Yoma 12:a).

• On Tisha B'av, Jews fast and mourn to commemorate the destruction of the First and Second Temples. They also read the Scroll of Eichah, a lamentation for the destroyed city of Jerusalem.

• Jews conclude the Yom Kippur service and the Passover seder with the words, "Next year in Jerusalem."

• Wherever in the world they are built, synagogues are oriented toward Jerusalem.

• When they build their houses, some Jews keep part of one wall unfinished as a sign of mourning for the destruction of the Temples and to symbolize the temporary nature of the dwelling.

• At the end of the Jewish wedding ceremony, the groom breaks a glass to indicate that even in our greatest joy, we mourn and commemorate the destruction of the two Temples. The breaking of the glass is accompanied by the recitation of part of Psalm 137: "If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget its cunning. If I do not remember thee, let my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth, if I do not set Jerusalem above my highest joy."

• After the wedding, at the Sheva Brachot, we express hope that the sound of joy, love, happiness and peace will be heard in the streets of Jerusalem.

• When we comfort a mourner, we say, "May God console and sustain you with all the mourners of Zion and Jerusalem."

• Throughout the centuries of their dispersion, in whatever corner of the earth they found themselves for close to 2,000 years, Jews prayed three times a day for the return to Zion, the biblical synonym of Jerusalem.

• In our daily prayers today, we mention Jerusalem numerous times. We pray for its peace, requesting God to return to Jerusalem and dwell in it again. During the Amidah, we face east toward Israel. In Israel, we face toward Jerusalem, and in Jerusalem, we face toward the Temple Mount. And when we say Birkat Hamazon, "Grace After Meals," we ask God to rebuild Jerusalem speedily in our days.

• Even the word "Zionism," the movement to gather the Jews to their ancient homeland, is inspired by the hilltop in Jerusalem, Mount Zion.

• Israel's national anthem, which expresses hope for peace and freedom in our ancient homeland, refers to it as "the land of Zion and Jerusalem" rather than "Israel."

In order to better understand the unique connection between Jews and Jerusalem, we need to look at Jewish liturgy, poetry, literature and the Hebrew Bible.

In liturgy, poetry and literature, Jerusalem has more than 70 names, all expressing love, yearning, commitment, hope, dedication and attachment to this city:

• The first mention of Jerusalem is in the Egyptian texts of the 19th-18th centuries BCE and was probably pronounced "rushalimum."

• In the Tel el-Amarna letters of the 14th century BCE, it is called "Urusalim."

• In the Assyrian's Sancheriv inscription, it is called "Urssalimmu."

• The Greek name "Hierosolyma" reflects the holiness of the city (hieros means "holy").

• In the Bible, it is usually spelled "Yerushalem," but sometimes "Yerushalayim."

• The "city of Salem" that is mentioned in Genesis 14:18 and in Psalm 76:3 is a reference to Jerusalem.

• The Hebrew meaning of the name "Yerushalem" is "foundation of peace" (yeru means "found," Shalem/ shalom means peace).

• Prior to its conquest by King David, the city was called "Yevus," in reference to the Yevusites who lived in Jerusalem at the time. King David called it Ir David, the city of David.

• The ancient name "Zion" was used even before King David conquered this place, as it says in Samuel 2, 5:7: "David took the stronghold of Zion, the same is the city of David." Zion at first signified the King's fortress, but later became synonymous with the entire city (as we learn from Psalm 76:3, Zion also means Shalem).

Tribute to Israel

• The name "Mount Moriah," today known as the Temple Mount, is mentioned in the Torah, and from the Jewish perspective, is an area of special holiness. It is located beneath the platform on which the Muslim shrine of the Dome of the Rock stands.

• The Hebrew prophets and subsequent poets gave the city many names of admiration and reverence, including "The City," "God's City," the "Holy City," the "City Of Justice," the "Faithful City," the "City Of Peace" and the "Beautiful City."

In the Hebrew Bible, Jerusalem is mentioned 350 times, by the name Zion, 108 times, and by other names, about 150 times (the city is not referred to even once in the Qu'ran).

Interestingly, within the five books of the Torah themselves, Jerusalem is referred to only once, by the name of Shalem (Gen. 14; 18). It is mentioned in connection with Malchitzedek, who was a king and priest, at the end of the story of Abraham's battle against the four kings who invaded from the north.

The Midrash also contains a reference to Jerusalem. In Genesis Rabba, God himself names the city: "Said the Almighty: 'I will name it Jerusalem'" (Gen. Rabba 56).

The binding of Isaac (Genesis 22:1-19) takes place "in the land of Moriah" on the site of the present-day Temple Mount.

The first specific mention of Jerusalem by its modern name is found in Joshua 10:1-5, when king Adoni-Tzedek of Jerusalem wages a war on Joshua and loses.

Three thousand years ago, King David made what was then a village into his capital. He brought the Ark of the Covenant, the religious symbol of the Jewish nation, into the city and defined the site as both the political and spiritual centre of Israel. Since then, it has been the central focus of the Jewish world, both in Eretz Israel and in the Diaspora.

When King Solomon built the First Temple, the Torah commandment for Jews to visit the holy site three times a year for the Shalosh Regalim (Sukkot, Pesach and Shavuot) could only be fulfilled in that city.

In his grand dedication speech, King Solomon pointed out that one of the Temple's functions is to act as a mediator between the person who prays and his God: "…and they will pray unto the Lord towards the city which thou hast chosen, and towards the house which I have built for thy name…" (Kings 1, 8:44) Kind of a "gate to heaven."

Although the Temple has been destroyed for almost 2,000 years, and Jews have been dispersed to the four corners of the world, Jerusalem remains the focus of the Jewish world.

One of the world's most ancient cities, Jerusalem is mentioned in many documents of antiquity. From all the great cities that existed at the time of King David, it is the only one that is still here, alive and vibrant, and is certainly the most beautiful, fascinating, inspiring and interesting one.

For a city built on a hill, with no access to a body of water and no natural resources, it is quite extraordinary.

There have been periods when Jews were not permitted to live in Jerusalem, but there was never a moment when Jerusalem did not live within the Jews, as individuals and as a people.

In the Jewish consciousness Jerusalem has always been irreplaceable. Long before Christians and Muslims, the Jews would persist in their refusal to replace Jerusalem, though it was only ruins and dust. That persistence was expressed with strength and pain on the banks of the rivers of Babylon and is still expressed even today.

With the establishment of the State of Israel in 1948, we have indeed become the privileged generation of Jews who have seen with our own eyes the return to Zion. We are those spoken of by the Psalmist: "When the Lord will return the captivity of Zion, we will be like dreamers" (Psalms 126:1).

Pray for the peace of Jerusalem, May they who love you be serene. Peace be within your walls, serenity within your palaces, For the sake of my brethren and companions, I will now say: 'Peace be in your midst.' – Psalm 122

A Salute to Our Community and Its Volunteers

UJA FEDERATION CAMPAIGN 2004
FOR ISRAEL AND THE JEWISH WORLD

Allan Silber

Richard Venn

On behalf of UJA Federation Campaign 2004, we salute so many selfless volunteers featured in this exceptional supplement. Your remarkable dedication has created a quality of Jewish life, which has catapulted Toronto to the top of worldwide Jewish communities.

Over the last few years, we have all witnessed dramatic changes in our Jewish world. We know that terrorism can strike anywhere at any time. We know that Israel is suffering from its worst recession since 1948, and we are horrified by despicable anti-Israel and anti-Semitic acts around the world.

Last year, Israel Emergency Campaign 2003, so superbly led by Ronnie Appleby and Howard Sokolowski, raised a remarkable $65 million. This year's campaign 2004 is a special campaign to continue the critical work we began last year.

Powered by the volunteer vision that our community has demonstrated to the world for nearly a century, we will, once again, we're sure, confront these difficult challenges with confidence, generosity and determination.

UJA FEDERATION OF GREATER TORONTO

We live in an extraordinary Jewish community. Toronto is the focus of communities around the Jewish world which seek to learn from the success that we have achieved in creating a network of day schools and community services, and a strong UJA Federation to support them.

Our achievement rests largely on the shoulders of our past and current volunteer leadership. The vision, commitment and ability that volunteers bring to the communal enterprise provide the human and financial resources that are at the heart of our efforts. We honour our leadership each year in order to recognize their contribution and to reflect on how we are truly stronger together.

With best wishes.

Volunteering and Beyond

Over the past ten years, our community's focus on a thriving Jewish future has led to a growing interest in Jewish spirituality. This has not been limited to a desire for more intensity and passion in synagogue services, but a quest for the transcendent in all areas of life. Could there be more to giving and community involvement than the emergence of our "inner mentsch"?

In a famous biblical story, the Almighty's presence came to comfort and visit with Abraham after his circumcision. Spying some desert travelers, Abraham "puts G-d on hold" and runs to offer his hospitality to the three strangers.

If developing intimacy with G-d is the ultimate spiritual activity — why would Abraham give priority to being a "nice guy"? He understood that "hanging out" with G-d was one thing — but acting G-dly himself was even higher.

There is no greater closeness with G-d than transforming ourselves to act as G-d acts. When this consciousness informs our tzedakah activities and community involvement, we are not just helping others — we are connecting with the Almighty and with the essence of who we really are.

— Rabbi Michael Skobac,* Jews for Judaism

Community Awards

The women and men pictured on Pages C3 and C4 have made tzedakah and community involvement constant priorities in their lives. Their unrelenting commitment to Jewish values helps enrich the lives of so many and instills enormous community pride in us all. These community role models received their Volunteer Recognition Awards on behalf of the entire community at UJA Federation's Annual Meeting on June 17, 2003.

BEN SADOWSKI AWARD OF MERIT

The Ben Sadowski Award recognizes individuals with long standing records of senior community service with UJA Federation and the larger Jewish community. It is this community's most prestigious volunteer recognition award.

SANDY BROWN

For more than a decade, Sandy's expertise, commitment and leadership have benefited a broad range of community organizations.

Her long and distinguished association with UJA Federation includes serving as President from 1997-1998, as well as sitting on the Project Renewal, Jewish Toronto Tomorrow, birthright Israel, and Social Planning & Allocations Committees. Currently she is a member of the UJA Federation Board of Directors.

In addition, Sandy has assumed other key leadership roles including serving on the Board of UIA Federations Canada, Past President and member of the Board and Executive of UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education, member of the Executive Committee of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario Region and past Chair of Bialik Hebrew Day School, where she is a Life Member.

"While it is humbling to be the recipient of awards for one's communal service, it truly has been a privilege to serve one's community. The act of giving of oneself is richly and immeasurably rewarded by the personal satisfaction one gains from the experience. High praise must be given to all who volunteer and to all those many dedicated professionals who make the volunteer service so meaningful."

LEADERSHIP DEVELOPMENT AWARDS

Leadership Development Awards, which were established to encourage young men and women to assume community leadership roles, are presented to those individuals who demonstrate extraordinary commitment and service.

MICHAEL BUCKSTEIN

Michael's commitment to Israel and the community began in his student years at CHAT. Coming full circle, he joined the CHAT Board and served for three years from 1993-1995. He has been Chair of UJA Federation's Major Gifts Division for the past two years.

A fervent advocate of Israel, with strong family ties in Jerusalem, Michael will co-chair the upcoming UJA Federation B'Yachad Solidarity Mission to Israel in November.

"I want my children to look at our community work and be as inspired and proud of us as I am of my parents and their generation. We have a way to go. My wife, my father and UJA Federation's Emissary from Israel Yossi Tanuri are my community heroes. They model selflessness, humility and accomplishment."

LYNN KIRSHIN

A graduate of UJA Federation's 1993 Leadership Development Program, Lynn has chaired UJA Federation's Young Adult Division (YAD) and currently sits on UJA Federation's Partnership 2000 YAD Committee.

She is also a member of the Keren Hayesod International Young Leadership Committee as well as the National Young Leadership Executive. Lynn is this year's recipient of the National Young Leadership Award presented by UIA Federations Canada.

"I have learned so much and met so many outstanding people by volunteering in the community. It is seeing the actual fruits of people's labour that I find so satisfying. It is amazing what one person can do but what is even more amazing is what can be accomplished by people working together for a common cause."

More awards, see Page C4

GRANOVSKY AWARD FOR CAMPAIGN EXCELLENCE

Named after the late Jewish community leader Phil Granovsky, the award is a tribute to individuals who exemplify the best in UJA Federation campaigning.

CAROLE STERLING

A dedicated fundraiser and active member of the community, Carole has been involved in UJA Federation since 1995, demonstrating outstanding leadership as the 2000 Women's Campaign Chair, Vice Chair of Campaigns 2002 and 2003 and a past Chair of the Walk with Israel. She currently sits on the Jewish Toronto Tomorrow Vaughan Campus Steering Committee, the UJA Federation Board of Directors and the Israel Now Consortium.

Carole's volunteer involvement extends to Temple Sinai, the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism, CHAT, Canadian Friends of Hebrew University and State of Israel Bonds.

"This community is blessed with many volunteers who give so generously of their time and effort. As Jews we are commanded to be responsible, one for the other, and in so doing we strengthen and support each other. The greatest reward and motivation for doing is the opportunity to do more. I am grateful for the opportunities that have been given me, and I am honoured and privileged to be the recipient of this year's Granovsky Award."

SHEM TOV HONOUREES

The Shem Tov Awards are presented to leaders representing the highest levels of excellence in volunteer service in Toronto's Jewish community.

HENRY ICYK
Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living

Presently Chair of the Budget and Finance Committee and a member of the Building Steering Committee, Henry has been involved at Bernard Betel since 1998. Henry also enjoys volunteering as a coach and fundraiser in both baseball and hockey at the rep and house league levels.

"Having elderly parents myself ... I wanted to become involved with an organization that offers a program that enhances the lives of the elderly. I feel very fortunate to have this opportunity to volunteer my time and expertise to the Bernard Betel Centre in helping them achieve the wonderful work they do."

MORRIS MILNER
JVS of Greater Toronto

Since completing his Ph.D. in Biomedical Engineering in 1968, Mickey has devoted his career to improving the quality of life for people with physical disabilities. JVS of Toronto has benefited from his compassion and expertise through the numerous positions he has held on the Rehab Advisory Council, the Board of Directors and Executive Committee.

"Volunteering enriches volunteers and the endeavours to which they commit valuable time and experience. Truly committed volunteers add naturally and positively to the hearts and souls of those they serve."

ALEX SEROTA
Jewish Camp Council of Toronto

During his long and impressive association with the Jewish Camp Council, Alex has held almost every position on the Executive, including Treasurer and President and currently sits on the Board of Directors. In addition, Alex is active in Beth Sholom Synagogue, Magen David Adom and State of Israel Bonds.

"To volunteer is in my opinion a great mitzvah. To help in bettering the lives of fellow Jews and others by volunteering in aid organizations locally and overseas provides the greatest satisfaction anyone can have."

FRAN SONSHINE
Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care

Fran has been actively involved with Baycrest for over 12 years as a member of the Foundation Board of Directors and Executive Committee, Co-Chair of the Guardian Gifts Campaign, and a member of the Board of the Women's Auxiliary. She is also Vice Chair of UJA Federation's Women's Campaign & Advocacy and National Vice President of Canadian Hadassah-WIZO.

"I cannot imagine a world without volunteers. Voluntarism is the backbone of a civil, compassionate and caring society. Giving my time and energy to benefit others is of vital importance to me."

HOWARD UNGERMAN
Reena

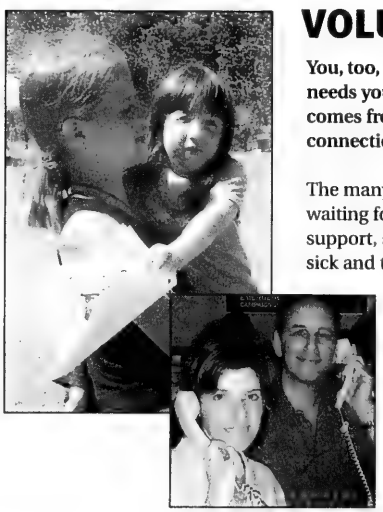
A dedicated volunteer with Reena for more than 20 years, Howard served as Chair from 2000-2002. A lawyer by profession, he was instrumental in helping Reena ensure that individuals who are developmentally challenged have the same rights and privileges as others more fortunate when the City of Vaughan proposed a by-law limiting group homes.

"Volunteering my time and energy to such a wonderful agency as Reena for almost 25 years has been such a privilege and joy that I am honoured to have been given the opportunity to do so. These feelings are the essence of volunteering."

CECILE ZAIFMAN
Jewish Family & Child Service

During Cecile's 2002-2003 presidency, JF&CS underwent an intensive strategic planning process. An active member of the JF&CS Board for thirteen years, Cecile has held other key volunteer positions, including sitting on the Leo Baeck Day School Board of Directors and on the United Jewish Welfare Fund Investment Committee.

"Giving back to our community has always been a part of my family. It is important to set an example for our children so that the vulnerable and disadvantaged will be cared for in the next generation, and that our children know they have a responsibility for others in their community."



VOLUNTEER IN YOUR TORONTO JEWISH COMMUNITY

You, too, can share your expertise or talents – offer your time to someone who needs you – make new friends and contacts – experience the satisfaction that comes from helping others – develop a stronger connection to our Jewish community.

The many rewarding volunteer opportunities waiting for you include administrative support, serving as a Big Brother, visiting the sick and the elderly, fundraising for UJA Federation or working with children who have special needs.

A TRIBUTE

In Pirkei Avot (Ethics of the Fathers), we are advised not to separate ourselves from the community. This seemingly simple injunction represents the essence of Jewish living. We are all dependent on each other and responsible for each other. The community strengthens every individual and every individual strengthens the community.

The strength of our community is visible through our schools, our community centres, our agencies and thousands of talented, motivated, devoted volunteers, without whom our Jewish community could not function.

This special supplement is not just a tribute to them but to our collective community and every one of the 180,000 individuals within it.

Because we strengthen each other — Together We're Stronger.

UJA FEDERATION

WITH ISRAEL NOW

Dear Friends,

In every sphere of Jewish life, we look for role models to help us define the ideal. In the Jewish world, Toronto is the role model.

Few Jewish communities anywhere display such generosity, such commitment and such strength. Among the worldwide Keren Hayesod family of communities, Toronto, which ranks first in fundraising, sets an unmatched global example of devotion to Israel.

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto donations are currently at work in Israel on behalf of terror victims, trauma units, hospitals, pre-schools and kindergartens requiring extra security for their children and hard-pressed social service agencies. Toronto's extraordinary support is helping Israel deal with a very difficult situation.

Toronto's global reputation is a tribute to thousands of volunteers whose time and energy are directed to the loftiest of Jewish causes. Your volunteer spirit strengthens Jews everywhere.

I wish to thank you, to commend you and ask you to please continue with your great work on behalf of Israel and the Jewish people.

With my most cordial Shalom.

Amb. Avi Pazner
World Chairman
Keren Hayesod

A BIG SELL IN TORONTO

Over 30,000 Torontonians "shopped till they dropped" during a four-day Israel Mall extravaganza. Nearly 75 Israeli merchants and artists, assisted by more than 250 volunteers, set up shop at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, where they sold products from kosher foods to works of art, ceramics, toys, perfumes, cosmetics and jewelry. This 2nd annual event was sponsored by the Israel Now Consortium, the BJCC, the Government of Israel Economic Mission to Canada, State of Israel Bonds, and the Toronto Zionist Council.*

IF IT'S MADE IN ISRAEL, MAKE IT YOURS!

Buy Israeli, a new initiative of the Israel Now Consortium* demonstrates how every single Jewish consumer in the Greater Toronto Area can make a significant difference to Israel's sagging economy. More than 90 retail establishments have embraced this project by importing and selling Israeli-made products. Short of traveling to Israel, Buy Israeli is an excellent way to help Israel on an ongoing basis! For a complete list of products and merchants, visit www.jewishtoronto.net

*The Israel Now Consortium is comprised of more than 115 community organizations, united in solidarity with Israel, under the auspices of UJA Federation and the Consulate General of Israel.

HAPPY BIRTHDAY, ISRAEL!

What a party! More than 6,000 people braved the inclement weather on Yom Ha'atzmaut – Israel's Independence Day - to demonstrate the true spirit of Toronto's Jewish community as they marched from the Bathurst Jewish Centre to Earl Bales Park to mark Israel's 55th birthday. Sponsored by UJA Federation and the Israel Now Consortium*, this celebration featured fun for the whole family with singing, dancing, activities for children and kosher Israeli food.

MISSIONS LIFT ISRAELI MORALE

Toronto has sent more educational solidarity missions to Israel than any other city in the world. More than 1500 community members have joined over 30 UJA Federation sponsored missions since October 2000 to see how their gifts are helping those in need and lifting the spirits of all Israelis. For a list of upcoming Community missions, see the back page of this Supplement.

ISRAEL, WE'RE WITH YOU!

More than 20,000 walkers, sponsors and volunteers took part in this year's UJA Federation Walk with Israel – the world's largest solidarity walk on Israel's behalf. The massive turnout was a giant step in telling the world how much our Jewish community supports the people of Israel.

... a community in solidarity with Israel and the Jewish people.

Board of Jewish Education

Donald Bennett

"A very satisfying and meaningful experience for me was being present at one of last year's UJA Federation telethons and overhearing a future leader of our community, a CHAT student, making a cold call to a donor who usually contributed several hundred dollars. She was so convincing in her presentation that the donor raised her pledge to $5,000."

Committee for Yiddish

Rhea Shulman

"Since I spent my entire professional life working for the Toronto Jewish community, and was educated at the Arbeiter Ring Peretz Shule on Beverly Street, it was natural as breathing that, on retiring in 1988, I would join the Committee for Yiddish. My volunteering has opened a wonderful world in which Yiddishists work to preserve the Yiddish language and culture. I am devoted to this goal and derive great pleasure in helping to achieve it."

Holocaust Centre of Toronto

Ada Wynston

"As a hidden child survivor I was taught by my courageous rescuers in Holland to extend a helping hand. I have never forgotten that and it brought me to The Holocaust Centre to speak, along with other dedicated survivors, at schools, libraries and churches, about the Holocaust. As Chairperson of Jewish-Christian Dialogue, it is my passion and it gives me satisfaction to share my experiences with ministers and priests and their congregations so that one day, maybe, we can all live in peace." In 1993 Ada was knighted by Queen Beatrix of Holland for her interfaith and volunteer work.

Jewish Information Service

Toby Goldberg

"It has been my pleasure to volunteer at JIS for six years. It's been an ongoing source of learning, teaching and being involved with the community. The nicest part for me has been the wonderful, warm environment created by the other volunteers and staff."

Women's Campaign & Advocacy

Susan Gudofsky

"I find volunteering centres me for the other major parts of my life - work and family. I have learned to appreciate how lucky I am. I have met wonderful people who share my values. Volunteering has provided me great personal satisfaction."

Jewish Toronto Tomorrow

Peter Cohen

"The opportunity to make a significant contribution to the revitalization of a community through an unprecedented capital campaign happens once in a lifetime. I am privileged to have the opportunity to participate in the redevelopment of the Central Campus which I believe will become a treasure for the Jewish community of Toronto and the world."

Leo Goldhar

"The new Vaughan Campus in York Region will anchor one of the fastest growing communities in the world, giving every community member a place to call home. I am honoured to chair the outstanding steering committee which will make the Northern Campus, which began as a dream, a reality within the next few years."

Together We're Stronger!

The Toronto Jewish community is vibrant and thriving. Our remarkable quality of Jewish life is the direct result of our community's belief in our collective responsibility to care for one another. Whether as volunteers who offer their time and talent, or, as community members who express their concern by supporting events, we all, in our special way, demonstrate our unwavering commitment to Israel and the Jewish people.
Together We're Stronger!

ISRAEL FOR FREE

If you are 18-26 and have never been to Israel, the Toronto Jewish community invites you to spend ten days in Israel for FREE on the Canada Israel Experience birthright Israel Program. If sunrise at Massada, archeological digging in the Israeli deserts, touring the Old City of Jerusalem, white water rafting down the Jordan river, hiking in the Golan Heights, and hanging with your peers in Israel sounds incredible, then this trip is for you. The experience of a lifetime!

Once participants have returned home, the birthright Israel Alumni Committee (BAC) helps build a foundation of knowledge and experience in order to strengthen ties to the Toronto Jewish community and to Israel, enabling them to become the Jewish leaders of tomorrow.

For more information, visit www.israelforfree.com or Ivy Ackerman, Canada Israel Experience at 416-398-6931 ext. 3.

VOLUNTEER IN ISRAEL

Here are some volunteer opportunities that will allow you to share your enthusiasm and love for Israel.

- ARCHEOLOGICAL DIG FOR UNIVERSITY STUDENTS (age18+) – ends June 30, 2003
  Meet other students from the US and Canada while digging for ancient artifacts in the Kibbut Yotvata area. It's a component of UJA Federation's Partnership 2000, which develops relationships between the people of Eilat/Eilot and the people of Toronto's Jewish community.

- SAR-EL WORK PROGRAM (ages 18-65) – ends July 10, 2003 (ages 18-24) – International Youth Group, from August 4-21, 2003
  Work on an Israeli army supply and maintenance base as a civilian. Work is mostly manual labour, i.e. packing and sorting, painting, kitchen work and more. Sponsored by Canadian Volunteers for Israel.

For more information about these and other volunteer opportunities, visit www.jewishtoronto.net (click Volunteering)

SAY SHALOM TO ISRAEL

Climb aboard as UJA Federation Missions to Israel take flight.

- SOLIDARITY MISSION TO ISRAEL July/August 2003
  Even if you've visited Israel before, never before will you have experienced the jubilation of meeting the people of Israel and showing them your support during these difficult days.

- PRE-ROSH HASHANAH SOLIDARITY FLY-IN September 3-8, 2003
  At this special time of year, rediscover what Israel means to you on this solidarity mission.

- MEDICAL SOLIDARITY MISSION TO ISRAEL October 28 – November 4, 2003
  A unique opportunity for participants to visit first-hand Israel's renowned hospitals and for medical practitioners to network with their Israeli counterparts.

- B'YACHAD SOLIDARITY MISSION TO ISRAEL November 10-15, 2003
  Join this century's largest Canadian mission. Hundreds are expected to make a powerful statement of solidarity with Israel by becoming B'yachad participants.

- FAMILY MISSION TO ISRAEL December 2003-January 2004
  Forget Florida, Mexico and the other usual holiday destinations this coming winter and visit Israel! Experience its history, beauty and vitality with your whole family.

Israel Now Consortium:
Speaking With One Voice

With a membership of more than 115 community organizations, the Consortium, under the auspices of UJA Federation and the Consulate General of Israel, offers one of North America's most unified voices for Israel. Consortium members represent the entire religious and ideological spectrum of the community.

Chaired by Julia Koschitzky, a past recipient of this community's Ben Sadowski Award of Merit, the Consortium ardently and passionately demonstrates to the people of Israel they will never stand alone. Over 35,000 members of Toronto's Jewish community have participated in Consortium-sponsored events and programs since its inception two years ago.

Birthright numbers hit record

Canadians on the Birthright Israel program last summer. [Israel Sun photo]

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Canada has always contributed more than its fair share of young people to Birthright Israel trips, but this year's spring/summer numbers have reached record proportions.

Birthright officials announced last week they expect to send approximately 1,400 people to Israel between May and August 2003, a 280 per cent increase over the same period last year.

Only 368 people took advantage of Birthright's free trip to Israel last summer, although the number increased substantially during the winter season, to 842.

"It's crazy this summer," said Elizabeth Sokolsky, vice-president of education and operations for Birthright Israel. The program's "excellent" numbers may be due to a "tipping point" being reached in which a collective hesitation to travel to Israel because of security concerns seems to have ended, she said.

Birthright is a four-year-old partnership between the Israeli government, Jewish philanthropists, North American Jewish fededrations and other Diaspora communities that sends 18- to 26-year-olds to Israel on fully subsidized 10-day educational and cultural trips. In its first year, the program proved so popular that Birthright held a lottery to deal with the large number of applicants: 920 Canadians participated, but organizers had 3,000 applications

With the onset of the Palestinian intifadah, numbers plummeted, though figures for Canada were always out of proportion to the country's population.

Worldwide, 8,000 young people are expected to take part in Birthright programs this spring and summer. Of that number, 5,000 will hail from North America – 1,400 of them Canadians.

Toll free number set up for German pensions

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

With a deadline of June 30 looming, the federal government has set up a toll-free telephone line for survivors of Nazi ghettos to apply through Human Resources Development Canada for German government pensions.

HRDC invites those interested to dial 1-800-454-8731 between 8:30 and 4:30 EDT and, at no charge, to inquire about or actually apply for German Pensions for Work in Ghettos ("ZRGB").

June 30 deadline

A year ago, Germany passed a law granting pensions to those who laboured in wartime ghettos, even if they volunteered. Payments will be retroactive to July 1, 1997. Applicants who file after June 30 may be eligible for a regular pension, but not for back payments.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Anniversary Marked

REGINA — As part of Regina's yearlong 100th anniversary, the 300-member Beth Jacob Synagogue is marking 10 years in the Pearl and Max B. Herman Centre with events this week that include two concerts and the dedication of the Nate Kohn Heritage Hall, a collection of artifacts of the southern Saskatchewan Jewish community. The shul will mark its own centennial in 2005.

ISRAEL

Barghouti Denial

JERUSALEM — Israel denied rumours last week that Marwan Barghouti, the jailed leader of the Fatah movement in the West Bank, would be released. The denial followed reports Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat phoned Barghouti's wife last Monday and told her husband would be freed within 48 hours. As well, there is speculation Palestinians are seeking Barghouti's release as part of calls to free Palestinian prisoners under the "road map" peace plan. Israeli Deputy Defence Minister Ze'ev Boim said Barghouti's trial for allegedly organizing terror attacks that killed dozens of Israelis would continue.

Israeli Bonds Set Record

JERUSALEM — Israel has wrapped up its biggest bond issue in history, a $750 million (US) offering that spurred $2 billion in demand and drew 200 global investors, including from Dubai. "It is very encouraging to see how quickly the institutional markets have responded" to the bid, Finance Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said last week.

Burial Box 'a Fake'

JERUSALEM — A burial box with an inscription suggesting it once held the bones of Jesus' brother is a forgery, Israeli experts said last week. "The ossuary is real," said Shuka Dorfman, the director of Israel's Antiquities Authority. "But the inscription is a fake." Investigators concluded the inscription cut though the box's fossilized sheen and was written in modern script.

WORLD

N.Y. Jewish Poverty Up

NEW YORK — Jewish poverty in greater New York has doubled in the past decade to 21 per cent of the community, while the number of Jews in the city fell five per cent to 972,000, the lowest in a century, a survey released last week shows. But due in part to suburban flight and an influx of Russian Jews, the Jewish population in the metropolitan area remained at 1.4 million, or 643,000 households. The poverty figures are "shocking," said Alisa Rubin Kurshan, vice-president of UJA-Federation of New York, which funded the study. This "will help shatter the myth of Jewish affluence," said Rabbi Marc Schneier of the New York-based Foundation for Ethnic Understanding.

Pre-Nup Modified

NEW YORK — Men who refuse to give their wives a get will pay $150 a day under a revised prenuptial agreement released last week by a coalition of Orthodox groups – the Beth Din of America, the Rabbinical Council of America and the Orthodox Caucus. The new agreement names the Beth Din of America as a default venue for giving the get and simplifies earlier prenuptial agreements, the groups say.

Romania Backtracks

BUCHAREST — Romanian officials reversed course last week and acknowledged that the country's former leaders collaborated in the Holocaust. The Romanian regime during World War II used "methods of discrimination and extermination, which are part of the Holocaust," a government statement said. The previous week, the government's denial that any extermination of Jews occurred on Romanian soil unleashed a torrent of criticism from Jewish groups and threats from Israel that diplomatic relations could be affected.

Gibson Defends Film

LOS ANGELES — Actor Mel Gibson has broken his silence about his yet-to be-released film on the last 12 hours of Jesus' life, saying it's "meant to inspire, not offend" and that neither he nor the film are anti-Semitic. Jewish leaders had worried the $25-million (US) film The Passion, in Latin and Aramaic, would blame Jews for Jesus' crucifixion. Gibson is reportedly a traditionalist Catholic who opposes reforms of the 1960s Vatican II Council, which rejected Jews' collective guilt for Jesus' death. In a statement, Gibson blamed misconceptions about the film, which he directed and co-wrote, on a draft script leaked to a group of Jewish and Catholic scholars.

Appeal to Christians

NEW YORK — Israel is launching a campaign to attract evangelical Christian tourists to the Jewish state. Announced last week by Israeli Tourism Minister Benny Elon and U.S. Christian leader Gary Bauer, it starts July 1 and features ads saying "Don't put your soul on hold" and highlighting Jesus' connections to the Holy Land. As Israeli tourism has plummeted because of the intifadah, Christians have "saved the industry," Elon said.

Police Name Jewish Leader in Drug Probe

BERLIN — Cocaine has been found in the possession of Michel Friedman, vice president of the Central Council of Jews in Germany, after searches of his home and law office in Frankfurt on June 11, German authorities said.

The raids came after Friedman's name came up in an ongoing probe of a Ukrainian crime ring involving slavery, prostitution and the smuggling of drugs and weapons into Germany. But prosecutors said Friedman, also the president of the European Jewish Congress, is not suspected of involvement in the ring and has not been charged with a crime.

Penalties for possession of illegal narcotics in Germany range from a fine to up to five years in jail.

German news outlets quickly highlighted the story about one of Germany's best-known Jewish public figures. Some used old photos of Friedman smiling and receiving Germany's highest medal of honour to illustrate the seamy news.

A well-known TV talk-show host, Friedman, 47, is also known as a speaker against racism and anti-Semitism and an outspoken supporter of Israel. He has suspended production of his TV talk shows, Friedman and Watch Out! Friedman.

Breaking a week's silence, Friedman filed a challenge in Berlin last Wednesday seeking to quash the investigation by Berlin authorities, since the allegations concern purported evidence obtained outside Berlin, authorities said.

Missionaries lose appeal on rights to menorah

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Chosen People Ministries (CPM), a Jews for Jesus-type group, is not entitled to use a stylized menorah as a legally protected symbol because the organization is not a "public authority," the Federal Court of Appeal ruled last week.

The court dismissed CPM's appeal of a Federal Court (trial division) ruling a year ago that reversed a decision by Canada's Registrar of Trademarks to grant CPM's semi-circular menorah official mark status in 1999.

CPM's menorah

In a brief oral decision handed down from the bench last week, a three-judge panel upheld last year's ruling, and awarded costs to Canadian Jewish Congress, which has for years fought CPM's attempt to protect a stylized, semi-circular menorah the group already uses on its stationery and signs.

Manuel Prutschi, national director of community relations for CJC, was pleased with the ruling, saying it "sends an additional message that [CPM] cannot misappropriate Jewish symbols with impunity."

CJC said the case serves as an another example of the deceptive and underhanded tactics so-called Hebrew-Christians use to lure vulnerable Jews to evangelical Christianity.

In documents submitted to the court, Congress argued that the menorah is "an ancient and hallowed symbol of the Jewish people," and CPM's "sole activity is to attempt to convert Jewish people to Christianity."

The court heard that CPM, a New York-based group with about 100 Canadian adherents and an office in Toronto, attempted to get official mark designation for its menorah on three previous occasions, and was turned down each time. The group was successful on its fourth try, in December 1999.

At the same time, CPM applied for trademark status for its menorah. That was also opposed by Congress, at the government level, but both sides have held that battle in abeyance pending the outcome of the court case over the official mark.

An official mark offers legal protection that is superior to a trademark. The status would have permitted CPM to use its menorah on all its wares and services, including those for sale, and potentially prevent others from using the same or similar symbol for commercial purposes.

But Congress pointed out that official mark protection is only granted to "public authorities," over which the government exercises control regarding funding, activities and tax rules. Congress questioned how CPM satisfies the definition of a public authority, which must operate for the benefit of the public and fill a public need.

The court agreed CPM is not a public authority, since it is not publicly funded and not subject to a sufficient degree of government control or intervention. The court noted that simply issuing receipts for tax deductions does not qualify a charity as a public authority.

CPM's lawyer, Mervyn White, argued that all charities operating in Canada are public authorities because they represent public interests, and are subject to "absolute and invasive" government control and are "creatures of statute."

The 'universal symbol of the Jewish people'

Noting the "high level of animosity" directed at his client, White said CPM sought the designation for its logo in order to protect the group from "persecution" and avoid having its religious beliefs "degraded."

Inevitably, arguments spilled over into theology and the thorny relations that have existed between so-called Hebrew-Christian groups and the Jewish community.

White conceded his client's mandate is to "spread the word of Jesus Christ among Jewish individuals in Canada." He said CPM's beliefs "do not accord with traditional Jewish or Christian beliefs, but the symbol accords with their beliefs."

CJC lawyer Ben Zarnett countered that members of CPM are "born-again Christians who believe in the deity of Jesus Christ" and whose "goal is the conversion of Jews to the Christian faith."

The menorah is the "universal symbol of the Jewish people," and the official emblem of Israel, he said.

Arguing that CPM is a public authority is tantamount to saying the Canadian government is in the business of converting people from one religion to another, Zarnett told the court.

Larry Rich, CPM's Canadian director, told The CJN his group would soon decide whether to seek leave to appeal the ruling to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Meantime, he said, "we are committed to our goal of sharing Yeshua [Jesus] with the Jewish people."

STEELES MEMORIAL CHAPEL

Pre-Arrangement — Purchasing Peace of Mind

For some, it is relief and peace of mind knowing that their wishes are now recorded and will some day be honoured by their family.

For others, it is to unburden loved ones of financial decisions at an emotional time.

For STEELES MEMORIAL CHAPEL it is a solid and guaranteed commitment to serving Jewish families according to their wishes.

A profound writer

Since January, in the last issue of each month, this space has been dedicated to coverage of Israeli authors and their works. The following column is about Israeli writer Aharon Appelfeld.

* * *

In the spring of 2000, the Centre for Jewish Studies at York University in Toronto invited Aharon Appelfeld, the celebrated, award-winning Israeli author to inaugurate the Silber Chair for the Study of the Holocaust and Eastern European Jewry. Appelfeld was at the centre for a week, delivering a number of seminars and public lectures.

Endowed by Allan and Hinda Silber in honour of their parents, the Chair is intended "to memorialize the victims of the Holocaust and the lost world of eastern European Jews." Few people in the world today are as worthy or as capable as Appelfeld to have been chosen to inaugurate the Silber Chair.

Born in Czernovitz in Bukovina (now part of Ukraine), Appelfeld was nine years old in 1941 when his mother was killed by the Nazis and he and his father were sent to a labour camp in Transnistria.

Unbelievably, Appelfeld escaped from the camp under the non-electrified fence, and spent the rest of the war in the forests and then working for the Soviet army.

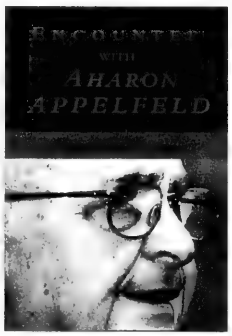
In 1946, at the age of 14, he – and ultimately, some 100,000 other child survivors of the Holocaust – arrived in mandatory Palestine to resume and to build his life.

Appelfeld has been described as "one of the best Israeli novelists of his generation." But his oeuvre incorporates more than novels. It is profound in scope and in content. Among the many honours he has received in recognition of his unique cultural contribution to literature has been the prestigious Israel Prize.

Happily for us, York's Centre for Jewish Studies has recorded some of the highlights of Appelfeld's vist three years ago in a book called Encounter with Aharon Appelfeld. Published by Mosaic Press, this slim volume is a treasure chest of gold nuggets of finely nuanced insight and beautiful writing.

Editors Michael Brown and Sara Horowitz have compiled, essentially, a mini-primer, a handy resource text about Appelfeld, his myriad writings and some of his achingly powerful insights into the nightmare that was the Shoah.

The book consists of three essays about Appelfeld – by the editors, Jonathan Rosen and Vivian Rakoff – two essays by Appelfeld himself, one of his short stories, a transcript of an interview by Eleanor Wachtel of the CBC and a 38-page bibliography by graduate student Abby Brown chronicling some 560 of his writings.



The book is important reading.

It is a pointed, intense window into an exquisitely humane and humble writer who provides inspiring insights about the human condition. Individuals who are familiar with Appelfeld's work will delight in the volume as will those who are reading Appelfeld for the first time.

Each contribution in the book is a ray of light. Together they help to illumine different aspects of the artist's life and impressive body of work. Considering that Appelfeld only began to learn Hebrew at the age of 14, his accomplishments are even more remarkable.

The short story, Chanukah 1946, is almost spooky, an unsettling allegory about human disfigurement.

His essays open eyes and hearts to the very different ways children internalized their vast suffering in the Shoah.

"While the adults spoke about what had been, for the children the Holocaust was the present, their childhood and youth. They knew no other childhood. Or happiness. They grew up in dread. They knew no other life…

"They knew man as a beast of prey, not metaphorically, but as a physical reality with his full stature and clothing, his way of standing and sitting, his way of caressing his own child and of beating a Jewish child."

Through Wachtel's thoughtful, gentle probing, Appelfeld tells us more about himself and his art. "I did not use language during the war. I learned not to use language. So by the end of the war, I had actually become mute, because it was dangerous to speak.

"The wrong accent, the wrong word and you are in their hands. Therefore I don't speak! That was the first rule. So, I learned not to speak. Muteness became a guiding principle. And so when I came to write, I understood the importance of the silence in a sentence, in a paragraph, in everything. You see, sometimes you think art is words and more words and even more words. But words and explanations do not always explain. Sometimes the silence between what you say – the silence that leaves the reader his imagination – is more important."

I highly recommend this book.

VOLUNTEERS' DAY IN ISRAEL:

UJA Fed. commits $1 M for campus advocacy

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto has allocated $1 million for the 2003-2004 year to fund advocacy initiatives at Canadian universities in response to a rise in anti-Israel sentiment and activity, announced Allan Reitzes, the organization's president, at its annual general meeting.

The federation also plans to raise "significant amounts of money" to start and complete planned Jewish community campuses in Vaughan and North York (the current Bathurst Jewish Centre/Lipa Green Building site) in order to provide world-class services, said new chair Leslie Gales, at the meeting at Adath Israel Congregation. She succeeds Ralph Shedletsky for a two-year term.

Gales co-chaired the Jewish Toronto Tomorrow initiative three years ago that launched the two community campus projects, as well as the redevelopment of the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre and the building of the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life, scheduled for completion later this year just off the University of Toronto campus.

Sandy Brown – a past president of the federation and this year's recipient of UJA Federation's highest volunteer honour, the Ben Sadowski award – spoke about the importance of Jewish education. She cautioned that "it isn't about bricks and mortar. It is about content and affordability... We must strive to establish a major community Jewish education endowment that will ensure access to all socioeconomic groups."

Earlier this month, the federation committed more than $1 million in new money to Jewish education for next year. Nine hundred thousand dollars [of that amount] is being directed to day school tuition fee subsidies, said Shedletsky.

Brown also paid tribute to professionals who work with the volunteers, adding that, "as leaders, we should be devising strategies to attract our young people into the noble professions of Jewish education and Jewish communal service, and if successful, make certain that we treat them with dignity and respect."

Among the other volunteers being honoured was Carole Sterling, a past Women's Campaign chair and two-time campaign vice-chair, who received the Phil Granovsky Award for Campaign Excellence.

Netivot HaTorah launches endowment fund

By STACEY STEIN
Special to The CJN

Netivot HaTorah Day School recently celebrated both its 18th year and the inauguration of the Elli and Max Podolski Education Endowment Fund with a lively evening featuring a performance by the Israel Defence Forces choir.

Attended by more than 500 guests, the Chai Celebration was held at the historic Carlu building and also featured speeches, a slide presentation, a tribute to alumni living in Israel and a performance by Netivot's choir.

The Elli and Max Podolski Education Endowment Fund, established in the couple's memory, will support the Netivot Educational Support Services (NESS) program, which provides curriculum support for the school's remedial and enriched children and supports other services, such as the provision of teacher assistants in many of the school's classrooms. Most of the school's teachers are supported by two or three teacher assistants, improving the student-teacher ratio.

'This program stands for a lot of things our school does differently from other schools'

"This program (NESS) stands for a lot of things our school does differently from other schools," said Y. Dov Meyer, who co-chaired the event with his wife, Karen, and David and Sarena Koschitzky, a granddaughter of Elli and Max Podolski.

The Podolskis fled Nazi Germany in 1938, first moving to Cardiff, Wales, and then emigrating to Canada in 1948, eventually settling in Toronto. Many of their great-grandchildren currently attend Netivot.

Meyer said Netivot represents the Jewish values the Podolskis lived by – the school's motto is Torah, Israel and Derech Eretz.

Located in Thornhill, Netivot is the only religious Zionist elementary day school in the city. Since 1985, its student body has grown from a handful of children to 525 students, with 570 enrolled for the upcoming school year. Netivot maintains a strong connection to Israel, and 40 of the school's alumni have made aliyah.

Meyer noted that many of the event's guests weren't from the school.

"One of the purposes of having this celebration was to show the community that in Toronto we have a religious Zionist school that is open to the community," he said.

Has your doctor told you to lose weight?

According to Health Canada, approximately 300,000 people die each year due to health related problems caused by obesity. Overweight and obesity are associated with heart disease, certain types of cancer, type 2 diabetes, stroke, arthritis, breathing problems, and psychological disorders such as depression. If your doctor has told you to lose weight, it is because your weight may be contributing to serious health issues.

Dieting Doesn't Work

It's been said that the definition of insanity is doing the same thing over and over again, each time expecting a different result. Yet millions of perfectly sane people start diets each year, hoping that this time it will be different, and that they will finally, magically, lose the weight for good. Approximately 33 billion dollars a year is spent on diet and weight-loss plans yet there are more overweight North Americans than ever before.

What's wrong with dieting?

The inherent problem with diets is that they focus on the foods you eat rather than helping you change the way you think about food. Eating habits are deeply ingrained in our subconscious mind. Without changing these habits, dieters become frustrated and soon give up.

Fortunately, there IS an alternative. Many health professionals are now recommending a revolutionary new non-diet approach to losing weight: hypnosis.

Finding the key to change

The subconscious mind often stores negative thoughts or behaviours that can trigger destructive habits. For overweight people, an inability to change these habits can result in a lifetime struggle with weight. The most effective way to overcome this obstacle is to reprogram the subconscious mind through hypnosis. "In a relaxed state like hypnosis, it's easier to incorporate new habits," explains Dr. Patrick Porter, Clinical Director and Founder of Positive Changes Hypnosis.

"We help clients think and eat like a slim person by redirecting their subconscious mind," says Porter. "You lose weight and keep it off long-term because you change your whole relationship with food. You never have to think about dieting, because your weight is no longer an issue."

"The easiest way to break habits is through hypnosis"
- Newsweek Magazine

"The country is turning to hypnosis to lose weight"
- Cosmopolitan Magazine

Research proves hypnosis works

As evidenced by recent studies published in medical journals, hypnosis has been shown to be a successful tool for weight loss. For example:

Lost Significantly More. In a study reported in the Journal of Clinical Psychology, subjects who completed a behavioural treatment program for weight management that included hypnosis lost significantly more weight that subjects whose plans did not include hypnosis.

Seventeen times more effective. The Journal of Consulting and Clinical Psychology reported on a study of 60 women who were at least 20% overweight. The women who participated in hypnosis lost an average of 17 pounds while the control group lost only a half pound on average.

Are you finally ready to lose weight for good?

If your doctor has told you to lose weight, you don't have a moment to lose. Don't start another diet! Make the phone call right now that can save your life. Don't you owe it to your loved ones to make this change? Call today to arrange your free consultation.

Zundel not prisoner of conscience, says Amnesty

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Amnesty International's Canadian office has turned down a request from Ernst Zundel's supporters that it declare the Holocaust-denier a "prisoner of conscience."

But the international human rights organization raised concerns about the use of security certificates in the refugee-determination process, including the one that currently involves Zundel.

In a statement released last week, Amnesty International (AI) said its definition of prisoner of conscience does not include persons imprisoned for hate speech. Such speech, by definition, includes "the advocacy of national, racial or religious hatred that constitutes incitement to discrimination, hostility or violence."

AI Canada spokesperson John Tackaberry said, "You cannot be a prisoner of conscience if you engage in activity that could lead to violence."

AI has taken the position that there are legitimate restrictions on the use of free speech, he added.

Zundel, who was deported to Canada from his home in the United States for overstaying a visitor's visa, is currently in custody pending the outcome of his refugee claim. The federal government has argued Zundel poses a security threat to Canada and should be denied refugee status. They have filed a security certificate prepared by the Canadian Security Intelligence Service in support of their claim.

Tackaberry said AI has been concerned about the use of security certificates for some time. "For us, the issue [in the Zundel case] is a fair hearing that is expedited and efficient," he said.

Use of the security certificates is unfair and not in keeping with international human rights standards, he added.

However, AI noted in its statement that the organization "has reminded the Canadian government that numerous allegations of possible commission of hate crimes have been made against Zundel, largely stemming from his position with respect to the Holocaust, and that those allegations must be investigated, leading to charges if borne out by the evidence."

That response prompted a rebuke from Ingrid Rimland, Zundel's wife. In responding to questions e-mailed to her from a National Post reporter and posted on Zundel's Web site (www.zundelsite.org), Rimland stated: "Amnesty International did what politically correct courts do – they took 'judicial notice' that the Holocaust was essentially what Hollywood told the world it was... Amnesty International is not an honest organization – it is a Marxist front, in many people's eyes."

Rimland went on to say that further investigations of her husband's activities "will make Jewish lawyers richer and Canadian taxpayers poorer."

She said AI had championed the cause of South African anti-apartheid advocate Nelson Mandela, who was not free of associations with violence.

But Tackaberry pointed out that AI never considered Mandela a prisoner of conscience for that very reason. "AI does not designate anyone a prisoner of conscience who is involved with or advocated violence," he said.

Teens to represent Canada at math contest

By ELYSSE ZAREK
CJN Intern

Two Jewish teens will be crunching numbers in Toyko at the International Mathematical Olympiad on July 10.

Oleg Ivrii and Jacob Tsimerman, both 15 and from Toronto, are part of a group of six students who will represent Canada at the competition.

They will spend two weeks at math camp at the University of Calgary before jetting off to Tokyo for 10 days of math competitions and touring before returning to Toronto.

The math olympiad is the world championships of math contests for high school students.

Both students are excited about the trip and the competition.

Oleg has had his sights on the math championships for a while, his father Victor said. "It was his dream for a few years to go there and finally he got it."

Oleg has always loved numbers and math concepts, his father said. When he was in Grade 1, he talked to his class about six-dimensional space.

This love of numbers comes from his family. His father is a math professor at the University of Toronto and his mother is a high-school math teacher.

Two Toronto students to take part

"We are a completely crazy mathematical family," Victor said.

Oleg has competed in the International Mathematics Tournament of Towns and won first prize in the University of Waterloo's Pythagoras contest when he was in Grade 6.

Tsimerman was inspired by his grandfather, who had a PhD in math and physics. As a child, Tsimerman studied the principles of math and physics with him.

The Grade 9 student at University of Toronto Schools says math is easier for him than most people. He recently completed a second-year calculus course at the University of Toronto.

He wants to pursue a PhD in math and philosophy.

Tsimerman has received gold medals in the Asian Pacific Mathematics Olympiad and Waterloo's Euclid and Fermat contests.

Both teens also received honourable mentions in the 2003 Canadian Mathematical Olympiad.

Debate about Jewish state ongoing: Rabbi Regev

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

After 55 years, Israel is still debating what it means to be a Jewish state, says Rabbi Uri Regev, executive director of the World Union for Progressive Judaism.

On one hand, the Orthodox believe a genuine Jewish state must be governed by the laws of Torah, and on the other, there is Israel's founding vision of a pluralistic state, Rabbi Regev said at a recent lecture sponsored by ARZA Canada, the principle voice of Israel on behalf of the Reform movement of Canada.

The past executive director and counsel for the Israel Religious Action Center (IRAC), the social action arm of the Israel Movement for Progressive Judaism, said that marriage law, which is of concern to everyone, is one narrow aspect of the debate.

"Religious marriage is still the only form of legal marriage in Israel, and Jews must marry through an Orthodox rabbi. There is no Reform, Conservative or civil marriage for anyone," he said.

Jews from the former Soviet Union can come to Israel under the Law of Return, he said, but they cannot marry because Orthodox rabbis do not recognize Russian immigrants and Reform marriages are not recognized.

A kohen who wants to marry a divorced woman is prohibited from doing so, said Rabbi Regev, because in Israel, priests cannot marry divorcees.

Despite the UN's universal declaration of human rights, the rabbi said, "hundreds of thousands of Israelis are denied the freedom to marry and start a family. These individuals are denied the basic rights of man."

In his blueprint for the state of Israel, Chaim Weizmann said that while there is a powerful religious community in Israel and it is our duty to respect it, we cannot put religion in control of the state, Rabbi Regev said.

"Weizmann forecasted a great struggle, but said we must be firm if we are to survive. There must be a clear line between religion and the lust for power that is exhibited by these religious groups."

A society with a separation of religion and state has the ability to nurture and support Jewish institutions, he said. "No lover of Judaism has been created because religion was shoved down their throat."

The main task, he said, is to create a model in which Judaism and democracy go hand in hand. "One can be seriously committed to Judaism and still hold on to the tenets of democracy."

Paid parking to continue at BJCC

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The Bathurst Jewish Community Centre (BJCC) has decided to continue designating 50 of its most accessible parking spaces for a paid lot.

The controversial policy, which prompted a mini-revolt among many of the centre's senior members, will be modified somewhat at various peak periods to address some of members' concerns.

Sherry Kulman, the BJCC's executive-director, said the gate will be lifted on the paid lot during the summer when the centre's summer camp is in full swing. School buses used to transport children take up many available spots and to free up more spaces, the paid lot will be opened. In addition, the lot will be free during high-traffic periods when parents pick up and drop off their children to free up more spaces in the remainder of the centre's lot, Kulman said.

Last winter, seniors complained bitterly about the new paid lot, saying the $2 charge

'It's viable and we're not taking it out'

was more than many on fixed incomes could bear. The policy forced some members to the more distant, overflow lot located over a bridge south of the Leah Posluns Theatre. Some seniors said they fell walking to and from the facility.

A petition was circulated to keep parking free and Kulman said at the time the BJCC would revisit the issue in June.

"We're not making what we projected [from paid parking], but it's viable and we're not taking it out," she said last week.

During theatre nights and for special events such as the recent clothing sale in the centre's gymnasium, the lot was full, she added.

In other developments, Kulman said work has concluded on the BJCC's renovated outdoor swimming pool and deck area, which re-opened on Father's Day. More than $200,000 was spent renovating the pool area and the building's front lobby, she said.

Camp George staff take part in Birthright trip

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Camp George counsellors who recently returned from the first ever Birthright trip for Jewish camp staff say they cannot bring all of Israel back to their camp this summer but they can plant the seeds of excitement for the country by showing campers their homemade film of Israel.

The trip was run in conjunction with the New York-based Foundation for Jewish Camping, Inc., which awarded a grant to Camp George and four other camps to equip the staff members with digital video equipment in order to film the trip for campers.

Camp director Ron Polster said the $12,000 US grant was awarded to the five camps out of more than 45 that applied.

The mission of the delegation, he said, was for the counsellors to view their experiences not only as their own, "but as lenses through which our entire camp community is able to gain a better understanding and appreciation of Israeli life and culture."

At the end of the 10-day trip, the group – Polster joined them at that point – spent four extra days meeting with this year's camp shlichim.

The nine Camp George staff members were Tamara Leszner, Natalie Reisman, Tanya Sermer, Julie Sermer, Aaron Krongold, and Dara Frankel, all from Toronto; Aaron McQuillan from Regina; Leah Gingrich from Calgary; and Perry Gast from New Jersey.

Using three cameras, the counsellors shot 18 to 20 hours of footage, which will be edited by camp staffer Daniel Goodbaum.

The video footage includes Israeli sights, each person's personal journey, and Israeli youth.

They plan on screening the footage as the culmination of the camp's annual Israel day, as well as at various times throughout the summer.

"We are also planning an ongoing program in which we will play a segment of a counsellor standing at a certain site, and campers will decide which site it is and point out the spot on a map," he said.

At a recent meeting after their trip, Julie Sermer said that the trip reaffirmed her connection to Israel. "It is one thing to feel connected intellectually, but it is another to feel it deep down in my bones."

Camp George staff relax in Israel.

"I will be able to tell people what I felt and show them where I went, but I cannot, for example, make them feel what it smells like in the Negev. I cannot portray the overwhelming emotion that made me want to cry.

"I cannot bring back all of Israel, but I can instil in the campers the need to visit their homeland."

Tanya Sermer said that before she took the trip, something was missing in her Jewish life. "Now I feel more whole, and I believe that will affect how I teach the material.

"I have never before felt so proud to be Jewish. Israel enabled me to find my Jewish identity and reaffirmed my belief in God," she said.

Tanya Sermer said it was special to spend time with the shlichim. "Their challenge is to convey their lives to us, and this gives them a chance for us to see their lives first hand."

Julie Sermer said that in visiting the host families, the group saw that Israelis live "very similar lives to us. The trip gave us a historical sense of Israel, but we also learned that Israelis are friends who have many of the same issues we do."

Riesman said that while in Israel they talked a lot about whether they were tourists or pilgrims.

"I felt like a pilgrim. The trip was not just for fun, it was my Jewish duty to go," she said.

She'arim honours Rabbi Scheim

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Philip Scheim is a reluctant honoree – "It's not my thing to be honoured," he says – but he couldn't say no to She'arim Hebrew Day School, which serves children with learning disabilities and/or attention deficit (hyperactive) disorder.

Rabbi Philip Scheim

"They do such good [at the school]," said the 49-year-old rabbi in an interview in his book-lined synagogue study.

Rabbi Scheim, spiritual leader of Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation, is the recipient of She'arim's 2003 Keter Shem Tov Award for community leadership and support of Jewish children, particularly those at She'arim. The tribute dinner and fundraiser was scheduled for June 25, at Beth David.

As a parent, Rabbi Scheim knows first-hand about She'arim's work. His younger daughter, Batya, attended the school for two years. "It was a very positive experience."

As a rabbi, he has seen congregants whose lives, he said, have been changed by the school. One young man is now doing "extremely well" in university and is involved in the Jewish community, he reported. "She'arim set him on the path of learning and opened the door. This story is repeated all over the place."

As for the rabbi's involvement with the school, he has assisted with fundraising because tuition, at $14,900, covers only a percentage of the costs due to a high teacher-student ratio; in addition, many students receive subsidies, he explained.

Although Rabbi Scheim speaks eloquently about She'arim, his top priority for many years – aside from tending to the 1,250-family congregation he has served since 1981 – has been encouraging travel to Israel. "I've always had the sense that when times are tough, that's when we have to mobilize and go to Israel," he said.

Beth David has had groups going to Israel every year for the last four or five years, he noted. The rabbi has also made a point personally of travelling there several times a year. He has organized two Israel missions for the Rabbinical Assembly, the umbrella organization of Conservative rabbis, on whose executive council he serves

In his Rosh Hashanah sermon last year, Rabbi Scheim took the unusual step of asking people who had been to Israel in the past year, as well as those who had firm plans to go in the coming year, to stand so that he could honour them. He also wanted others to see who they were, so that they could ask them about their experiences there.

"Rabbis are always very happy when a sermon motivates one person," he said. But Rabbi Scheim knows of about two dozen people who made plans to visit Israel as a result of his High Holy Day sermon. "That's rare," he said.

A more recent sermon addressed the need for respect among Jews of different denominational streams, another issue on which the rabbi, a past president of the Toronto Board of Rabbis, has spoken out before. Rabbi Scheim – who grew up Reform in Montreal and gravitated to Orthodoxy before attending the Conservative movement's Jewish Theological Seminary – told The CJN he believes it's important to respect "every Jew who takes Judaism seriously."

Actually, he noted, the mix of denominations at She'arim is one of the reasons the school appeals to him. "It brings together Orthodox, Conservative and Reform. They're Jewish kids coming to learn. That's a wonderful model."

ORT raises $45,000 for school in Israel

By ELYSSE ZAREK
CJN Intern

More than 80 people attended ORT's recent annual Golden Circle luncheon that raised more than $45,000 for a high school in Israel.

The money will go toward buying extra teaching hours at the Harmatz School of Engineering in Jerusalem.

Joel Shapiro, executive director of ORT Toronto, was pleased with the turnout. "It's wonderful for ORT to be supported by so many people," he said.

ORT is the third largest educational and vocational non-governmental organization in the world, educating more than 286,000 students in its network of programs, training centres and schools around the world.

The organization has been particularly affected by the ongoing terrorism in Israel. Several dozens of its graduates have been injured or killed since the violence began three years ago, says ORT board member Ian Leventhal.

ORT Toronto had invited two Israeli students to come speak at the luncheon, one of whom set up a science experiment about growing crystals that was brought on the space shuttle Columbia, but the students cancelled their trip because of SARS (severe acute respiratory syndrome). Their speeches were presented on videotape.

What right of return actually means

To a frightening degree, unfortunately, the Arab world has succeeded in dictating the terms of the debate on the conflict between Israel and the Palestinians. Nearly four decades of unremittingly hostile and false propaganda, with the United Nations as the Arab world's distinguished soapbox, have taken their toll since 1967. The world appears no longer able to distinguish truth from falsehood. The record has been utterly ignored or altered. History itself has become irrelevant, and in a sense, to the world's great peril, defiled.

The Arab world, and eventually the leaders of the Palestinian Arabs, refused at every critical turn of events in the conflict – in 1936, 1947, 1949, 1967, 1979 and 2000 – to find a compromise, despite the plea by the Jews and the Jewish state to do so. They have never shown a sincere desire to try to accommodate the presence of a state for Jews in their midst, Rather, they have only wanted to prevent and then to supplant such a state.

But the Jewish state refuses to be supplanted.

Incapable of defeating Israel in the field of battle, Israel's enemies, alas, have been considerably more successful in the field of propaganda. Their latest artillery piece in this theatre of the conflict is the demand of a "right of return" for the Palestinian refugees of 1948. That any of the "right of return" salvos have found their mark in a receptive western world is a further betrayal of history and of the honesty that is its indispensible requisite.

The mere contemplation of a "right of return" in this context is legally and pragmatically inappropriate. But more than that, it is morally offensive.

There is no such right under international law; nor was such a right conferred under any of the legal instruments that have accompanied the conflict. Nor is there any precedent for the existence of such a right in any of the displacements of human beings that were the sad outcome of any of the wars of the last two centuries. But the deeper reason to oppose such a right is that it is morally repugnant. Propounding a "right of return" for the Palestinians is transparent code language for propounding the destruction of the Jewish state. There are fair and reasonable accommodations for Palestinian statelessness. But this is not one of them. How is it conceivable then, that enlightened, well-meaning people can champion such a right? But they do.

Thus, last weekend, Toronto city councillor Olivia Chow, was slated to attend and address Al-Awda's First International Convention on Palestinian Right of Return and Self-Determination in a New Colonial World: Strategies and Actions. Most of the conference's listed organizers and participants are well-known individuals who villify and delegitimize the Jewish state.

How is it possible, then, that Chow would join in their cause, which, without shame, but rather with great earnest purpose, calls for Israel's destruction?

Appalled at political stance

In response to the letter stating that the Canadian Alliance is the only party standing up for world Jewry, I must say that I am appalled.

This party does have a good record of support for Israel, but while I can not defend all of the NDP's Middle Eastern policy, it is the only party that has considerably fought against racism in Canada and abroad.

Israel must remove Hamas

Israel was too quick to accept the so-called "road map" to Mideast peace. It was clear from the outset that Hamas rejected the peace proposals. We have now witnessed Hamas, together with Islamic Jihad and the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigades, attack an Israeli military outpost in Gaza that killed five Israeli soldiers as well as perpetrate another horrific suicide attack on a bus in Jerusalem on June 11 that killed 17 and injured more.

Clearly, the Palestinian Authority (PA) cannot be counted on to eliminate these terrorist organizations, as the PA Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas has indicated he will not use force to disarm the terrorists. Now that Hamas, Islamic Jihad and Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigades have joined forces, they are an even greater threat to the security of Israel. The Israeli army should march into the headquarters of all three organizations, seize their records identifying their leaders and bombers and arrest them all. Once these evil forces have been removed, the road to peace can be pursued. In 1967, it took a pre-emptive strike to save the State of Israel. The same should be done now.

Gerber misses the point

It is unfortunate that Jean Gerber takes a complex issue that requires patience and tolerance on all sides and reduces it to a string of intemperate exaggerations ("Wars over the Wall," CJN, June 12). In doing so, she misses the point altogether.

The Kotel belongs to every Jew precisely because the rules there follow the lowest common denominator of standards that all can abide by. There is no monitoring at the Kotel of belief, politics or personal practice. It is probably the only place where Jews of all affiliations pray together.

But the behaviour of the Women of the Wall undermines this. Their introduction of certain halachically forbidden practices into the precincts of the Kotel prevents traditionally oriented men from praying at the same time. There is no law that prevents someone from praying in whatever way they like elsewhere in Jerusalem. Why is it so important to the Women of the Wall to do so in just the place where it is sure to scandalize many others who regularly pray at the Kotel? It makes one wonder what part of their motivation is heartfelt prayer and what part is political grandstanding.

While it's regrettably true that on occasion, the provocative behaviour of the Women of the Wall has elicited some hotheaded behaviour in response, this is the reaction of a few of the hundreds at the Kotel at any given time and is universally condemned. This whole issue is lost, however, in the hostile haze of Gerber's diatribe. The way she calls all opponents of the Women of the Wall "thugs" is beneath the dignity of The CJN. Furthermore, her coded pejorative usage of the word "haredim" to mean all Jews who consider themselves bound by tradition is inexcusable in a publication intended for the whole community.

Film viewers be warned

In his review of The Believer, Larry Anklewicz says it is "not always a comfortable film" ("True story about a Jewish neo-Nazi," CJN, May 29). Having recently seen the film, I feel viewers should be forewarned that this characterization is far too mild. Yes, the film is "fascinating and challenging," but it also visually and intellectually brutalizes the viewer.

Your readers should be aware that The Believer contains scenes that may well be intolerable for many viewers. A Jewish student is viciously attacked; a synagogue is graphically and gleefully desecrated. The anti-Semitic rhetoric is far beyond the typical incitement to hatred. Danny, the protagonist, an intellectual, Judaically knowledgeable skinhead, corrupts Jewish learning and theology in the most destructive manner imaginable. I found myself thinking that many of the scenes and much of the rhetoric could be exploited by those with the vilest of intentions.

The film and its protagonist ultimately achieve a redemption, and the impact is indeed powerful. But your readers should know that The Believer may be, for many, simply too painful.

Oy, tradition!

What a great "Reb Tevya" Rabbi Marmur makes, dancing through life singing "Tradition, Tradition" while the shtetl becomes more irrelevant to more and more people ("Why I don't officiate at same-sex marriages," CJN, June 12). Such wilful neglect or denial of change is the very reason many gay and lesbian Jews are deserting the shuls (and Judaism altogether in some cases), only to join liberal Christian, Buddhist or other more accepting faith groups. I personally know more than a dozen same-sex Jewish couples who have married at Christian or Unitarian churches because of the welcome and acceptance they received in these places. It is sad to hear rabbis complain about the sad state of Jewish solidarity and commitment and then disallow some Jews to participate in "tradition." For Rabbi Marmur, it is an issue of kedushah, not tzedek. How strange. My Torah says justice and holiness are one and the same.

Perspectives

Two sides of the story: reframing the Arab-Israeli Conflict

By OTTO BARUCH RAND

With the election of Mahmoud Abbas as the Palestinian prime minister and the publication of the Middle Eastern road map, there might be a new window of opportunity for peace between the Israelis and Palestinians. There are, however, many obstacles to a substantive change, and coming to a political agreement acceptable to both parties is only one step in removing them. It is naive to assume that a rapprochement between the two people can be accomplished strictly on the political level. Without a shift of opinions at the grassroots level and substantive change in the education of children, a political settlement may not last.

Peace will require debunking the many myths on which the Palestinians' political position rests and which are being perpetuated, particularly in educational institutions. In order to be able to live peacefully together in neighbouring societies, each party will need to reframe the image it had created of its opponent, and also redefine itself and its own perceived truths.

Separation of Religion from State

An important change needed in both Israel and a future Palestinian state is one that every enlightened society has gone through – the moving of religion from the political to the personal realm. This does not mean Israeli and Palestinian societies must become secular. Religion may continue to play an important role in enhancing morality and ethics and combating social ills, but for there to be a fair and an equitable accommodation between members of different faiths, religion cannot play a dominant or formal role in politics. It is as simple as this: an institution that purports to harbour an absolute truth cannot share power with another absolute truth. Turkey is an example of how democracy can prosper along with a powerful religion (not without problems!) on condition that religion is banned from power politics.

To separate religion from politics might be harder in Israel than in the Palestinian Authority (PA). It might be possible for the Palestinians to conduct elections without allowing parties with an exclusive religious agenda into the race, since a secular infrastructure is already in place. However, in Israel, Jewish religious parties have been participating in the government since the inception of the state, and excluding them might result in a serious confrontation. Yet, since both the Israeli and the Palestinian societies are multi-religious, they must face this issue.

Conflicting Narratives

Each side of the conflict has its own historical narrative going back to the times of Abraham. The earliest discord between them is in the story of the Sacrifice. Whom was Abraham instructed to sacrifice? The Jewish narrative states clearly that Isaac was the intended sacrificial lamb; Islam teaches that it was Ishmael. The Christians accept the Jewish narrative with the rest of the Bible, but see the aborted sacrifice of Isaac only as a prelude to the real sacrifice of Jesus.

One could probably dismiss this historical disagreement as irrelevant to a peaceful coexistence, but not so the staunch believers on both sides. As far as they are concerned, the conflict extends to the ownership of land and to the identity of holy places. In 2000, the Palestinians destroyed a synagogue in the city of Shechem (Nablus) presumed to stand on the site of the Tomb of Joseph, because they considered it a Muslim holy site. On the other hand, in 1994, Baruch Goldstein, a Jewish settler from Kiryat Arba near the biblical city of Hebron, murdered 29 Muslims praying in the mosque adjacent to the Tomb of the Patriarchs, for he and many of the settlers considered the tomb exclusively Jewish, purchased by Abraham from a Hittite landowner some 3,000 years ago to be passed as inheritance to Jews.

The historical disagreements also affect archeological excavations. The Syrian government fought hard against an Italian team of excavators who suggested that they found in an ancient Syrian city, Ebla, cuneiform tablets that confirm, or at least strengthen, the possibility of Abraham's existence. Arabs have made an outright attempt – assisted by some Israeli scholars – to dismiss the ancient history of Israel as a politically motivated story, particularly as it refers to the Davidic and Solomonic kingdoms. PA President Yasser Arafat even claimed that a Jewish temple never stood in Jerusalem, although there are reliably identified remnants of the Herodian Temple (the so-called Second Temple) as well as a plethora of historiographical evidence dating back to the time when the Temple still existed. The purpose of this denial is to disclaim Israel's historic rights to Palestine. Some Arabs say there was no Jewish settlement in Palestine prior to the Balfour Declaration (1917).

This myth is as unfounded as Israel's claim that there was no sizable Arab population in Palestine prior to the advent of the British and, subsequently, Jewish pioneers. The truth is that Arabs had flourishing cities and villages, some of which date back to the Arab conquest in 640. Whether there are descendants of the earlier Canaanites among the present Palestinian population, as some claim, is irrelevant, because 1,400 years of continuous settlement provide enough historical rights without requiring further support. Equally, Jewish historical rights to the land in which they lived and established kingdoms for hundreds of years prior to the advent of the Muslims is undeniable and does not depend on whether all the biblical stories are proven true or not.

> 'New textbooks are needed as well as properly trained teachers to present both narratives'

If a settlement is to be reached, both sides' historical rights to the land must be considered equally valid and not mutually exclusive. Each party needs to acknowledge the historical rights of the other and cease trying to discredit them.

The War of Independence and Al Nakba

The gap between the narratives becomes wider as we enter the 20th century. The events leading to the Declaration of Independence of the State of Israel in 1948, the subsequent war and the refugee crisis following it are seen in a totally different light by the Jews and the Arabs. The difference is not only in facts but also in tone. Israel sees the events with a sense of euphoria, realization of a messianic dream, continuation of its glorious history that was interrupted by the tragic destruction of the Second Temple, the heroic struggle of a few against many. The Palestinians see it as an unparalleled tragedy, expropriation and expulsion of thousands of families from their ancestral lands, destruction of cities and villages, and – worst of all – turning hundreds of thousands of their people into refugees.

Jews and Arabs moving in different directions, symbolizing the conflict between Israelis and Palestinians. [RNS photo]

The Israeli narrative is triumphal. A people in need of a country because of persecutions in Europe culminating in the Holocaust returns to its ancestral homeland and attains sovereignty there. When the United Nations decided to partition the land, the Jews were willing to accept a UN resolution which allocated to them only 56 per cent of the land (in which they were a minority of one-third).

But the Arabs were not willing to accept the resolution. Instead, seven Arab nations declared war on the nascent State of Israel and lost. Israel offered peace and friendship to the Palestinians who would stay, but the Arab warlords told them to exit in order to return victoriously with the Arab armies after pushing the Jews into the sea. The Palestinians never accepted the presence of Jews in the area. They attempted, time and again, to reverse events by using violence, with the ultimate goal of occupying the whole land.

Today they are using terrorism and suicide bombers as their means of resistance. This hurts the Israeli people and the economy, but thanks to the steadfastness of the Israeli army, most suicide bombings are prevented. It is necessary to continue the occupation, not because Israel wants the Palestinian territories, but in order to prevent infiltration of terrorists from them.

The Arab narrative is blaming. It ascribes all Arab ills to the Jews and the West. No one had the right to parcel their land against their will. The Holocaust was not the fault of the Arabs. The Zionist goal was (and is) to replace the local population with Jewish refugees and turn the local Arabs into refugees. The war (Al Nakba) was an attempt to prevent the Palestinian tragedy, but because western nations supplied Israel with arms and volunteers, the Arab armies were defeated and more Palestinian territory was lost. Palestinians fled their homes at gunpoint. Israelis massacred entire villages to induce those remaining in their homes to run.

At the end of the war, Israel occupied 73 per cent of the land. Unhampered, Jewish immigration grew into millions. It was impossible to accommodate all the immigrants without expropriating further Arab land. This became possible after another unsuccessful attempt at liberation of Palestine during the Six Day War (1967). In its wake, Israel occupied all of Palestine and continues the occupation till this day. Moreover, it is establishing settlements even in the one-quarter of original Palestine left in Arab hands, and thus practically annexing the entire territory.

Which story is true? Unfortunately both, and it is hard to build a bridge between them without creating a parody. The only way to narrow the gap is to validate and teach both stories. Facts and perceptions are inseparable. Both sides must acknowledge the perceptions of the other and the facts will fall into place or become irrelevant.

The Educational Challenge

Even the minorities in each group that would like to solve the problem by the elimination of the other party know that it cannot be done. At the end of the day, Jews and Arabs will have to live together as neighbours, either in one bi-national or in two separate states.

Because of the inevitability of peaceful coexistence, both sides of the conflict should not waste time blaming or hurting each other. What our generation missed must be offered to our children: two sides of the story. Listening to each other may not cure the ills of the past, but it can be the beginning of building the future. There is currently no foundation for a new edifice. Only by acknowledging that neither party is completely right or completely wrong can they start building it.

To begin the process of attaining peace at the grassroots level, new textbooks are needed as well as properly trained teachers to present both narratives without a bias, and without hatred or vengefulness. Students of both nations must come to terms with the past by understanding their own story and also the pain and agony of the other. Myths must be debunked and truth faced, no matter how painful it is. This is how the revolution in education should begin. Dialogue about the future will follow. Without an educational revolution, there will be no real peace in the land.

When will you visit Israel?

Yes, I shouldn't be writing about the same topic again. Please indulge me, but I just got back from Israel – again– and I can't help myself. I have to write another "go to Israel" column.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

Go to Israel, because they need tourists, because the economy needs your money and because it is safe.

Here's where I need to discuss statistics (and I promise never to do a math column again). The recent violence has given some people the impression that it's dangerous to visit Israel. But that's not what the statistics conclude. Of course, we can never reduce any death to a "statistic". However, the only way to evaluate danger is by the numbers.

Last year, 2002, was Israel's worst year of violence in recent memory. In it, 453 Israelis, including 156 police officers and soldiers on active duty, were killed. Considering Israel's population of 6.7 million, that translates to 4.4 civilian deaths per 100,000.

Compare that with driving a car. In Canada, in 2002, there were 2,778 deaths as a result of car accidents in a population of 31.4 million, which translates to 8.8 deaths per 100,000. In other words, even in 2002, it was twice as dangerous to drive a car in Canada as to walk down the street in Israel (because of the drop in violence in 2003, Canadian roads are now 5 times as dangerous as a visit to Israel).

So why are people nervous about Israel? Because media coverage of every incident is non-stop. If car accidents were given similar round-the-clock TV coverage, people would be afraid to get into a car. Terrorism succeeds because it uses the media to manipulate our perceptions, making us imagine a major danger when there's only a small risk.

But even if it wasn't safe, we would still have to visit Israel.

Wherever our group went, Israelis thanked us profusely for coming, grateful that 40-odd tourists had visited. This exaggerated gratitude depressed me. I realized Israelis feel so alone that a full tour bus was a major event. It is shameful that when Israel needs us the most, it has so little support.

Support is our obligation, in good times and bad.

At Yad Vashem, a guide told us about a Polish couple that had been there several years earlier, simple peasants there to be honoured as "righteous of the nations." After the ceremony, they were asked why they risked their lives to save a couple of strangers. Their answer was simple: "We saw people running, and they needed help, so we took them in."

These words reminded me that there are times when we must forget all excuses, be courageous and help those in need. Now is one of those times.

Israel needs our help. It isn't even dangerous. Will you visit?

Aqaba and aftermath may signal shift in Israeli attitudes

The Aqaba summit in early June will be remembered not just for what took place there, but also for what happened later. Within seven days, Hamas launched several attacks against Israeli military and civilian targets; Israel attacked Hamas leader Abdul Aziz Rantisi; and a suicide bombing in Jerusalem killed 17 Israelis and wounded many others. It seemed like a return to the familiar pattern of hopeless deadlock, with no change in sight.

Shira Herzog in Toronto

But beneath the surface, there appear to be subtle changes taking place in Israeli public opinion that should give government and military leaders pause for thought. It isn't the first time the Israeli public has been ahead of its political leaders and not blindly accepted the "party line." And while the following survey results, published recently in the Israeli press, are just snapshots of a moment in time, they also point to longer-term attitudinal trends.

In keeping with consistent public support for a negotiated settlement leading to a Palestinian state – as long as terror ceases – a majority of Israelis have supported the U.S.-sponsored "road map" to peace since its publication. (Interestingly, this position holds despite doubts about the ability of Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas to fight extremist factions.)

Even after the most recent terrorist attacks and a growing sense the process was dead, 57 per cent of Israelis (including nearly 50 per cent of Likud voters) still supported the road map. This isn't surprising when other findings are analyzed: 67 per cent of Israelis agreed with Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's statement that the occupation is harmful to Israel; only 15 per cent of Israelis believed Israel would still be holding all the territories in five years; and 66 per cent said they supported the removal of unauthorized outposts (referring to Sharon's first, halting steps toward removing all the outposts established since 2000, as called for by the road map).

In other words, Sharon hasn't risked much in the positions he has taken over the last several weeks. In spite of the opposition he encountered within some Likud circles, he reflected the prevailing views of the centre of the Israeli political spectrum. In fact, 51 per cent of Israelis believe Sharon's should be guided by his own views and not those of his party.

A significant difference from past surveys showed up in Israeli attitudes toward Sharon' tactics against terrorism. Until the Rantisi incident and its bloody aftermath, Israelis generally gave Sharon a carte blanche in combating terror, because they believed political concessions alone would not decrease attacks against Israeli targets.

This has changed. After the failed attack on Rantisi, 58 per cent of Israelis said targeted killings are detrimental to Israel's interests and supported at least a temporary halt to the controversial practice. And more significantly, 40 per cent believed the attack on Rantisi was motivated by a political decision to delay progress on the road map. Israeli commentators were right to call attention to this unprecedented questioning not just of the government's credibility on security matters, but also that of the Israel Defence Forces.

Sharon and Defense Minister Shaul Mofaz cannot ignore this finding. Especially for the prime minister, it comes at a time when his personal credibility is declining on economic as well as security policy. A year ago, Sharon's credibility was at an all-time high of 74 per cent. A month ago, it stood at 65 per cent. Seven days after Aqaba, 54 per cent of Israelis considered him credible, and only 47 per cent expressed satisfaction with his performance as prime minister.

All this adds up to more than a tentative sense that Aqaba and its negative aftermath may in hindsight be seen as a turning point. The shift in Israeli attitudes on the question of how best to deal with the challenge of terrorism may have significant domestic political consequences. Like most politicians, Sharon cannot afford to alienate public opinion. Last week, he was given some important messages.

I found one additional finding particularly worrisome. Fifty-four percent of Israelis expressed concern for Sharon's personal safety in light of the vocal opposition he faces from his own constituency on the right. The shadow of former prime minister Yitzhak Rabin's assassination in 1995 still looms large for Israelis. Leaders of the settler movement have called on even their most ideological followers to draw the line at violent resistance to the government and its leaders. One can only pray their call will be heeded.

The best prime minister - for the Jews

Some weeks ago, a group of scholars released a ranking of the best Canadian prime ministers of the postwar period. They chose Lester Pearson, followed by Brian Mulroney.

Fine. But which recent prime minister was best for the Jews?

Is this a silly question? Is it irrelevant? We have all heard Jews ask themselves about any development or personality and whether it (or he or she) good for the Jews? Even sophisticates are not immune. So let's ask the question.

Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

For politicians, being good for the Jews can mean two things. It can mean taking actions and articulating positions that are specifically aimed at Jewish concerns, such as anti-Semitism or the defence of Israel. Alternatively, it can mean showing leadership on matters of general public policy that also have specific affects on Jews, such as policies on private-school funding or human rights.

In general, most of the long-serving prime ministers of recent vintage have been reasonably good for Jews on one or both counts. More or less, they have all been supportive of Israel. Most have supported immigration and Canadian multiculturalism. Most have taken steps to increase tolerance and promote equality at home and abroad. (About the worst episodes have been times that Canada's commitment to the United Nations and our helpful middle-power image may have led some of our leaders to overlook or tolerate biased anti-Israeli resolutions and actions, such as those at the 2001 UN World Conference Against Racism in Durban, South Africa.)

But no act by any prime minster, or former prime minister, compares with the recent speech by Brian Mulroney at a Jewish National Fund dinner in Montreal. It was essentially the same speech he gave to a University of Toronto audience in the fall. I was present for both speeches, and both were riveting and their effect electrifying.

No Canadian prime minister, and I suspect no American president, has ever given such a thoughtful, informed and personal speech. It both condemned Canadian anti-Semitism past and present and affirmed solidarity with Israel. Mulroney demonstrated both an intellectual understanding of, and visceral empathy with, Jews and Israel. His phrase "Israel is the new Jew" underscored the potential linkage between anti-Zionism and anti-Semitism.

This was not some ultra-right manifesto. Mulroney stated very clearly that his preferred Middle East scenario was to see a Palestinian state alongside a Jewish one, both living within peaceful and secure borders. But he was also absolutely clear that until that day arrived, he would stand firmly by Israel and would not preach to Israel about how best to safeguard its security.

Cynics can offer their own explanations as to why Mulroney did it. Maybe he was pandering to Jews who might in the future offer votes and contributions to the Progressive Conservative Party – something they haven't done much of in the past. But I reject that interpretation. If that was his motive, he went much farther than he had to.

This was a man speaking from the depths of sincerity to a battered community – 16 innocents had been blown up on a Jerusalem bus that day – in need of some outside support. This was a genuine, not Clintonian, "I feel your pain" speech.

Everyone, including hard-nosed veterans of Jewish and Canadian politics, left the Montreal speech deeply moved. I know I did. It will go down as a signal event in Canadian Jewish history.

It is with sadness that I report this is my last regular column for The CJN. It has been a privilege and a pleasure each month to share my thoughts with you over the past several years on a wide variety of issues.

Some columns were analytical, explaining why things happen or what may happen, but left my own views or convictions hidden. Others were prescriptive. They were rooted in ideological convictions and advocated specific policies and positions. Still others were personal, focussing on my private life and relying on personal anecdotes and humour.

I tried to blend aspects of all three in my writing. I have appreciated your feedback over the years, both the compliments and especially the arguments.

Have an enjoyable summer, and let there be peace in Israel.

The Kirshner File

Rosenberg case still mired in controversy

Fifty years have passed since Julius and Ethel Rosenberg were executed after being convicted of conspiracy to deliver atomic secrets to the Soviet Union.

On June 19, 1953, the couple, having exhausted their last desperate legal appeal, were given an hour of what passed for privacy before being escorted to the electric chair at Sing-Sing prison in New York. They embraced, kissed and exchanged final words. The poignant moment was caught by a photographer.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The Rosenbergs were to have been executed at 8 p.m. on that night, but in deference to the Jewish Sabbath, their fateful date with destiny was postponed by three hours.

Five decades after their execution, following the most celebrated espionage trial in American history, the Rosenberg affair remains mired in controversy. The questions asked back then are still relevant today: Were the Rosenbergs guilty? Did they deserve to die? Were they victims of a travesty of justice?

The case, which unfolded against the backdrop of the Cold War and a climate of anti-communist hysteria, has inspired a flood of scholarly articles, books and movies.

Although they were one of the most famous or infamous couples of the 20th century, depending on your perception, the Rosenbergs sprung from humble working-class origins.

Julius was born in 1918 in New York City. He was the scion of a Polish immigrant who toiled in the garment industry. His mother hoped he would be a rabbi, but Julius opted for electrical engineering at City College.

Ethel Greenglass, almost three years older than Julius, was also born in New York City. Her father ran a hole-in-the-wall sewing machine repair shop. After finishing high school, she worked as a clerk in a shipping company. She was fired for organizing a strike.

Despite Julius' membership in the Young Communist League, to which Ethel also belonged, the U.S. Army Signal Corps hired him as a civil engineer. Later, he and Ethel became full members of the American Communist party. Ethel's brother and sister-in-law, David and Ruth Greenglass, were communists as well.

The Rosenbergs dropped out of party activities in 1943. According to historian Howard Sachar, Julius was recruited by officials of the Soviet consulate in New York to transmit data in Signal Corps manuals. Ethel stayed at home, raising their two sons.

In 1944, David Greenglass, a skilled machinist, was invited to join the top secret Manhattan Project, whose mission was to develop an atomic bomb. Greenglass was assigned to a laboratory in Oak Ridge, Tenn., and then to a lab in Los Alamos, N.M.

Julius was sacked in 1945 when his ties with the Communist party came to light. He and Greenglass, along with two other partners, opened a small machine shop.

Shortly afterward, Klaus Fuchs, a German-born British atomic scientist who had worked in Los Alamos, was detained on suspicion of having turned over classified information to the Soviets via an American contact known as Raymond. In an effort to try to ascertain Raymond's real identity, the Federal Bureau of Investigation focused on Harry Gold, a chemist sympathetic to the communist cause. Gold confessed he had conveyed atomic data to the Soviet Union. Before being sentenced to 30 years in prison in July 1950, Gold claimed that Greenglass had passed sensitive information to Julius.

On June 17, 1950, about a week prior to the outbreak of the Korean war, Julius was arrested on suspicion of espionage. He maintained his innocence until the end. Ethel was detained in August. But much to their surprise and horror, Greenglass turned against them after the federal authorities promised him his wife would be granted immunity from prosecution. Greenglass himself was sent to prison for 15 years.

Another pivotal figure in the Rosenberg affair was Morton Sobell, who knew Julius at City College. A communist, Sobell was charged with having conspired with Julius and others to commit espionage. He received a prison sentence of 30 years.

Julius and Ethel were formally indicted in January 1952. They were accused not of treason, but of conspiracy to commit espionage and of enlisting Greenglass in the plot.

These events took place at a time when the Soviet Union – a U.S. ally in World War II – and communism were viewed with the utmost of suspicion in the United States.

In 1946, Joseph McCarthy, a zealous Red baiter, was elected to the U.S. Senate. In 1947, the U.S. Congress inaugurated hearings to root out communists and fellow travellers in the Hollywood film industry. In 1948, a State Department official, Alger Hiss, was indicted for perjury after having denied his involvement in espionage on behalf of the Soviet Union. In 1949, Moscow detonated an A-bomb, breaking the United States' nuclear supremacy. And in 1950, the Korean war broke out, pitting the West against the forces of communism.

Amid these developments, the Rosenberg trial convened in Manhattan in March 1951. The chief prosecutor was Irving Saypol, the son of Russian Jewish immigrants. One of his assistants, Roy Cohn, was the son of a New York State Supreme Court judge. (Cohn later served as an aide to McCarthy.) The judge was Irving Kaufman. Julius said that he looked "like a cross between a rabbinical student and an army sergeant."

Julius Rosenberg and his wife, Ethel, kiss before their execution

The Rosenbergs were pronounced guilty and sentenced to death in April 1951. Kaufman described their crime as "worse than murder." Their lawyer, Emanuel Bloch, appealed. The United States Court of Appeals rejected the defence argument and the U.S. Supreme Court chose not to hear arguments.

A "Pro-Rosenberg Committee" publicized the Rosenbergs' cause, but mainstream Jewish organizations branded the committee "a Communist-inspired group."

The director of the FBI, J. Edgar Hoover, and attorney-general Herbert Brownell, persuaded then-president Dwight Eisenhower not to grant the Rosenbergs a commutation. The execution was scheduled for June 18, 1953, the Rosenbergs' 14th wedding anniversary.

Their defence team appealed to U.S. Supreme Court justice William Douglas. On June 16, he granted the Rosenbergs a stay. By way of response, Chief Justice Fred Vinson summoned the court into special session. The justices rejected the stay.

The Rosenbergs' execution touched off mass demonstrations in the United States and Europe. Their two sons, Michael and Robert, were adopted by Abel and Anna Meeropol. (Abe Meeropol wrote the music and lyrics for Strange Fruit, Billie Holiday's haunting trademark song).

Sachar, in A History of the Jews in America, claims that while Julius was indeed guilty of espionage, Ethel was convicted on "tainted evidence," though was almost certainly an accomplice.

Anti-Semitism played no role in the case, in his opinion.

In their definitive study, The Rosenberg File, historians Ronald Radosh and Joyce Milton write that Julius was the co-ordinator of "an extensive espionage operation." As for Ethel, she probably knew of and supported her husband's endeavours. But Ethel's conviction, they say, was based in large part on a last minute change of testimony by key witnesses and was "relatively weak."

Radosh and Milton argue that the Rosenberg spy ring was never "the primary conduit of U.S. atomic secrets to the Soviets." Yet federal prosecutors and FBI officials wanted the Rosenberg case "pursued to the limits of the law." They hoped that Julius would name names – unmask spies in important positions in the United States – and that the case would create a chilling effect by setting a lasting example to potential traitors. Neither supposition panned out.

Radosh and Milton believe that a grave miscarriage of justice was perpetrated. First, Ethel was arrested to pressure her husband into breaking his silence. Two, the law under which the Rosenbergs were tried did not allow for capital punishment of individuals who spied for a wartime ally (the Soviet Union).

Michael Meeropol thinks that his parents' conviction was based upon perjured testimony and fabricated evidence, and that U.S. government agents and agencies orchestrated their "frame-up."

In a new book, An Execution in the Family, Michael's brother, Robert, admits that his father participated in "an illegal and covert effort to help the Soviet Union defeat the Nazis." But he maintains that the evidence used to convict them "only demonstrated that they had been framed."

True or not, the consensus is that the prosecution of the Rosenbergs did not fulfil the high standards of American justice and fair play. As Radosh and Milton put it: "The fate of the Rosenbergs remains a blot on America's conscience."

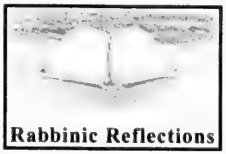
Jewish Life

From the inside out

By RABBI MICHAEL SKOBAC



Rabbinic Reflections

As Moses was about to lead the Jewish people into the Promised Land, they asked to first send an advance party of spies. God consented, and Moses directed the 12 chosen spies to determine the strength of Canaan's inhabitants and the quality of the land. After 40 days, the spies returned, and 10 of them reported, "It is a land of milk and honey… however, the people are very fierce, and the cities are large and well-fortified."

Suddenly, Caleb, the 11th spy, cut them off, proclaiming, "We should go up immediately and occupy the land, because we can surely prevail!"

But the spies insisted the land couldn't be conquered because its people were too powerful. Accepting this gloomy report exposed the nation's lack of faith, and God condemned them to perish during 40 years of wandering in the desert.

Since God approved the reconnaissance mission, it is difficult to understand His harsh reaction to the spies' assessment. And what provoked Caleb's stern outburst after the initial report of the spies? They were merely reporting their findings.

The Midrash describes those who despaired of the land as a "topsy-turvy generation" (Numbers Rabbah 16:5). The Lubavitcher Rebbe explained that the spies erred in reversing the order of what Moses asked them to determine.

Moses' focus was on carrying out God's will that the land of Canaan be conquered, so he directed the spies to first report on the strength of its inhabitants. When the spies returned and began to describe the quality of the land, Caleb suspected their interest centred on the material benefits of Canaan. He feared they would weigh the effort and danger needed to take the land versus the potential payoff and decide that the project was not worthwhile. Hoping to nip them in the bud before spreading their seeds of doubt to the people, Caleb hastened to silence the spies.

The incident of the spies is followed in the Torah by the commandment to attach tzitzit, ritual fringes, to the corners of a garment. The connection between these passages is not simply their proximity. The Torah uses some form of the word latur 11 times in describing the mission of the spies. Significantly, the Torah uses this same word to describe the effect of looking at the tzitzit, "You shall not go astray (taturu) after your hearts and after your eyes."

According to Rabbi Mendel Lewittes, the Torah is saying here that sin is a process. It is often assumed that our eyes are engaged by something and then our hearts begin to desire it. The Torah maintains, however, that the process begins within our hearts (innermost values), which condition what our eyes notice. Two people see a valuable lost object on the street; one relates to it as a mitzvah and seeks to find the owner – the other sees it lining his pockets.

The problem with the spies stemmed from how they viewed the land of Israel. Moses, Caleb and his colleague Joshua were focused on implementing God's plan for the Jewish people to conquer it. Therefore, their concern was to determine how strong its defenders were in order to formulate a plan of attack. The other spies viewed the land as a potential source of material benefit, and so they concentrated on its qualities.

The commandment of tzitzit addresses the spies and all who err like them – attitude affects perception. The faith of the spies slipped, because they placed self-interest above the will of God. The tzitzit call us to cast our gaze on them, draw us to meditate on the path of Torah and gently guide us to envision a world in line with the Divine.

One person can make a difference

By HOWARD DRIMAN

Guest Voice

This is not a Holocaust story; neither is it intended to be the expression of a father's pride in his daughter. It is, rather, an example of how one person can make a difference in other people's lives with little effort, and so make the world a better place.

In 2001, my daughter Julia, in her last year at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT), participated in a school trip to the rally for Israel in Washington, D.C. While there, she acquired, for a small donation, a metal bracelet on which was inscribed the name of a person killed in a terror attack in Israel. Hers read "Ofir Magidish."

On Feb. 14 this year, Julia sent me an e-mail from the University of Western Ontario, where she is a student. She said, "Today is the second anniversary of the death of Ofir Magidish who was killed in Israel. I wear his ID bracelet – my silver one – every day and I feel somehow connected to him. So tonight I am going to shul for prayers. He was 20 years old in 2001, so he would be 22 now."

Attached to the e-mail was something Julia had found on the Internet, which mentioned Ofir's death and the town from which he came. He was waiting for a bus to return to his military base when a terrorist crashed another bus into a crowded stop south of Tel Aviv. Included in the e-mail was a "Prayer for the Well-Being of the Israel Defence Forces," which Julia asked us to read when we recited the Kiddush that evening.

I was touched that Julia would take the trouble to go by cab to and from the synagogue in London to pray for someone who was really just a name to her. I felt that the Magidish family would like to know that there was someone on the other side of the world who didn't know them or their son, but thought of him just about every day of her life, and went to shul to pray on his yahrzeit. I e-mailed the UIA Federations Canada office in Jerusalem and asked if they could find the address of the Magidish family and gave the name of the town cited in the e-mail. Within 24 hours, Dvora Wilshansky emailed back to say she had spoken to Ofir's mother and sister, and she gave me the family's names and address.

In a letter to the family, Julia wrote, "I truly feel that Ofir has changed my life without ever even knowing him. Many people ask to see the bracelet – Jewish and non-Jewish – and each time I tell them about Ofir Magidish and the conflict that is taking place in Israel. Through my bracelet, his story is being told to so many people…

"I wear the bracelet with pride. It gives me strength to tell everyone I can about the terrorism in Israel and the soldiers who are courageously fighting for Israel, as well as for us in the Diaspora…

"It reminds me of the importance of education about Israel. It makes it clear to me what life is all about. It gives me hope that one day there will not be a need to make these bracelets…

"Please know that although I do not live in Israel or serve in the army or experience what Israelis experience every day, I, along with thousands of others, am thinking of Israel and we are doing our best to show you our support. I, along with many of my friends, have been to Israel three times during the current intifadah. We attend lectures, put up posters and run programs at university – and do anything we can to make the lives of those in Israel easier. Israel is not alone."

A few weeks later, after the war in Iraq, Julia received a reply: "We were very excited to read your letter and to know that someone on the other side of the world is thinking of Ofir. In Israel, where there are terror attacks every day and people are hurting on a daily basis, the dead and wounded are forgotten after a few days, and the newspapers are full of new victims. Through your letter, we felt your strong commitment to Israel and the difficult situation in the country. We felt your will and the will of the Jews in the Diaspora to help the people in Israel, and yes, you are helping. We were very excited to read that you are wearing Ofir's name on the bracelet…"

The family proceeded to tell Julia about their late son and their respective dreams and aspirations for him, all of which died with him.

"Two years have passed since the tragedy and we still cannot believe that Ofir is not with us, and we miss him terribly. When we received your emotional letter, you touched our soul and warmed our heart, knowing that we are not alone and that in some way, you feel with us our pain, that you remembered the day that our son was killed and prayed for him. We hope that you and the rest of the Diaspora Jews will keep visiting Israel and we would be happy to continue to be in contact with you and see you when you next come to visit Israel."

It was gratifying for Julia to know that she had touched the souls and warmed the hearts of a grieving family in Israel. She felt enriched and heartened. The ripple effect of that small donation in Washington was indeed considerable.

Chupahs and the Internet

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

It is perhaps the most touching moment of a Jewish wedding. The chatan and the entire wedding party are joined under the chupah by the kallah. The chupah, or wedding canopy, is a beautiful and ancient tradition that many couples are now imbuing with personal touches. Today, a look at chupahs on the World Wide Web.

First the chupah's origins. We find two biblical references to chupahs: Psalm 19:6 compares the rising sun to a groom's radiance as he exits his chupah [http://www.breslov.com/ref/Psalms19.htm]; and Joel 2:16 exhorts a bride to leave her chupah, and the groom his wedding "room," to ask Divine forgiveness and avert national disaster [http://www.breslov.com/ref/Joel2.htm].

In his essay on the Huppah: From Eden to Today, Eliezer Segal explains that today's weddings under the chupah hark back to the "paradigm of all weddings: the Revelation of Torah at Mount Sinai. In the biblical account of the marriage between God and the people of Israel, our sages also discovered allusions to the presence of a chupah, whether in the enveloping cloud of darkness that hovered over the people, or in the fact that the Israelites, about to enter into their marriage with God, were made to stand 'beneath the mountain' – just as the bride stands beneath the sheltering chupah on her wedding day." [http://makeashorterlink.com/?L16A218E4]

If you want to look online for someone to create your chupah, check the listings at MavenSearch [http://mavensearch.com/subjects.asp?S=502] or go to Google [http://google.com] and search for "chupah" or "chuppah."

As chupah-makers go, Richard Caro has some pretty interesting credentials. Caro is a direct descendent of Yosef Caro, the 16th-century kabbalist of Safed, author of the the Shulchan Aruch, the Code of Jewish Law. The contemporary Caro from Hudson, N.Y., feels he has a special responsibility to create the right chupah. "I see myself as a builder, and a chupah is a spiritual representation of a couple's first house… something that they will have in their lives forever." [http://www.forward.com/issues/2001/01.11.23/fast3.html]

Dena Bliss posted an e-mail to the Pomegranate Guild discussion area looking for advice about building a chupah for a friend who is getting married. Check out the creative responses from Elaine, Laura and Irene. [http://www.pomegranateguild.org/wwwboard/messages/17.html]

Seth and Amy Krostich have put the plans for their chupah online along with shots of them hammering, painting, assembling – and even kissing – under it. After its formal use, they plan to keep in the garden of their new home. [http://www.sethandamy.com/ceremony/chuppah.html]

Instead of designing your chupah by yourself, make it a communal effort. Elsa Wachs asked friends and family to contribute personal items to be incorporated into her son's chupah. The chupah has become a family heirloom and has been used at the weddings of Wachs' three sons, two cousins and other relatives. Rahel Musleah's lovely article, Chuppahs of Hope from Jewish Woman magazine tells how chupahs have evolved to symbolize what one artist calls "love, beauty and joy." [http://www.jwmag.org/articles/03summer/p22.asp]

As for what actually takes place under the chupah, there are many customs. The Jewish Virtual Library provides a good summary of the wedding process. [http://www.us-israel.org/jsource/Judaism/marriage.html] I was particularly interested in the questions people have asked rabbis that are posted at the Jewish.com site. Questions like: Who circles whom and how many times? Were wedding rings used during the days of the Torah? Why are chupahs traditionally held outdoors? To the final question, Rabbi Leibie Sternberg answers that since Abraham was blessed that his descendants would be as numerous as the stars, we wish to apply that blessing to every chatan and kallah. [http://makeashorterlink.com/?V1CC23DC4]

If you are planning some time under the chupah, you'll want to make sure that everything goes like clockwork. But life doesn't go as planned as you'll see in the Chupah Horror Stories presented at the Country Yossi Family Magazine Web site. There are tales of red wine spilled on white wedding dresses under the chupah, the band that missed the chupah because it was stuck in the elevator, and the couple that only realized under the chupah that they hadn't bought a wedding ring – and purchased one from one of their guests. [http://www.countryyossi.com/nov00/chupah.htm]

U.S. Jews not responsible for Iraq war

MYTH:

American Jews pushed the United States to go to war against Iraq in 2003 to help Israel.

FACT:

One of the most absurd arguments made by opponents of the U.S.-led war against Iraq in 2003 was that American Jews were somehow responsible for persuading U.S. President George W. Bush to launch the military campaign on Israel's behalf.

The truth is that Bush decided that Iraq posed a threat to the United States because it possessed weapons of mass destruction and was pursuing a nuclear capability that could have been used directly against Americans or could have been transferred to terrorists who would use them against U.S. targets. The removal of Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein was also designed to eliminate one of the principal sponsors of terrorism.

The war in Iraq liberated its people from one of the world's most oppressive regimes. Even in the Arab world, where many people objected to the U.S. action, no Arab leader rose to Saddam's defence.

It is true that Israel will benefit from the elimination of a regime that launched 39 missiles against it in 1991, paid Palestinians to encourage them to attack Israelis and led a coalition of Arab states committed to Israel's destruction. It is also true, however, that many Arab states will likewise benefit from the removal of Saddam – in particular, Saudi Arabia and Kuwait. This is why these nations allowed Allied forces to use their countries as bases for operations.

As for the role of American Jews, it is important to remember that Jews comprise less than three per cent of the U.S. population and were hardly the most vocal advocates of the war. On the contrary, the Jewish community was divided as the whole country was and most major Jewish organizations purposely avoided taking any position on the war. Meanwhile, public opinion polls showed that a significant majority of all Americans supported Bush's policy toward Iraq.

Some critics have suggested that prominent Jewish officials in the Bush administration pushed for the war. In fact, only a handful of officials in the administration is Jewish, and not one of Bush's top advisers – Secretary of Defence Donald Rumsfeld, Secretary of State Colin Powell, Vice-President Dick Cheney or National Security Advisor Condoleezza Rice – is Jewish.

The suggestion that American Jews are more loyal to Israel than to the United States, or that they have undue influence on U.S. Middle East policy, is an example of anti-Semitism. Unfortunately, some critics of the war on Iraq chose the age-old approach of blaming the Jews for a policy they disagreed with rather than addressing the substantive arguments in the debate.

Jewish Toronto

Supporting Jewish Education

What we can do together

Dear Jewish Community Member:

Dr. Seymour Epstein (Epi)
Vice President, Education
UJA Federation

Marshall Kesten
Chair, UJA Federation
Board of Jewish Education

Toronto, as an organized Jewish community, has an exceptional reputation for its devotion to Jewish education, based on two factors: the diversity and quality of our schools and the high proportion of UJA Federation campaign contributions - $11 million for the 2003-2004 school year – allocated to tuition subsidies and other educational programs. Toronto's community funding for Jewish education is unrivalled in North America.

While we are proud of that reputation, we dare not become complacent, satisfied with the status quo. Jewish education is not about mere continuity; rather, it is about growth, development, and creativity. For years, dedicated professionals at the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education and in our schools have been working on all aspects of the high cost of Jewish education to develop a variety of solutions, which must be pursued in conjunction with each other.

Given the recent increases in tuition at some of the larger day schools and the justifiable concern on the part of many parents, we think it is worthwhile to present an accurate overview of Jewish education costs.

- It is very expensive to run quality schools.
- Teacher salaries account for the largest day school expenditure, and teacher remuneration is hardly extravagant. Our community needs well-trained, well-motivated teachers, whom we salute.
- Everyone in the community must be concerned about middle-income and low-income families that cannot afford day school education.
- Solutions to the problem of Jewish education costs are complex and multi-faceted. No one simple remedy exists.

For over three decades, UJA Federation has provided substantial financial support for Jewish education in Toronto. The recent decision by the UJA Federation Board of Directors to approve a $900,000 increase in tuition subsidies maintained this pattern of deep commitment to Jewish education. Last week's Jewish education budget increase was the result of years of work on the part of many people - professionals and volunteers - based on our ongoing effort to make Jewish education as accessible and affordable as possible. Subsidies are an important component of tuition relief, but there are others as well, outlined on the following page.

As a community dedicated to Jewish education, we must communicate better with each other, so that we can immediately dissolve the barriers that create a we/they situation and that contribute to any gaps in knowledge.

The BJE's first strategic goal is universal access to Jewish education, to which our community is deeply committed. With all our differences in ideology and religious practice, we are truly one on this issue.

Epi° Mk Kesten

Frequently Asked Questions About Jewish Education Costs

Q. Why are tuition costs so high?

A. First of all, we deeply sympathize with parents confronted by rising school fees, however, it is very expensive for a day school to provide high-quality Jewish education. Teacher salaries constitute approximately 85% of school costs. Day school parents justifiably expect motivated, talented teachers, for whom we express our admiration. Overhead and operational costs account for the balance of school expenses.

Q. How much does it cost to run Jewish day schools?

A. The operating costs for BJE affiliated schools total $100 million.

Q. Are school costs monitored?

A. UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education reviews the audited statements of all its funded schools annually.

Q. What role does the organized Jewish community play in providing tuition relief?

A. In the 2003-2004 school year, the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education will be allocating nearly $8 million for tuition subsidies to parents who can't afford full fees. These subsidies, which represent a $900,000 increase over last year, come entirely from UJA Federation annual campaign contributions. In conjunction with increased subsidies, which have been in the planning stage for many years, the BJE will be reviewing subsidy guidelines to help relieve the financial burden on middle-income earners. The UJA Federation subsidy program – unprecedented in North America – maintains a pattern, established over 30 years ago, of generous community commitment to Jewish education. UJA Federation's $11 million total allocation for Jewish education this year (for subsidies and other educational programming) is our largest single local expenditure.

Q. So what is the answer to high tuitions?

A. There is no one answer to the problem. The tuition fee challenge requires a variety of complementary responses. Withholding fees will certainly not reduce tuitions. It will only aggravate the financial pressure that day schools face.

Q. What is our ultimate objective?

A. Universal access to Jewish education is our ultimate goal. We cannot restrict Jewish education to the highest income earners. Jewish education represents the strongest guarantee of a thriving Jewish future.

UJA Federation
Board of Jewish Education

Seeking solutions for the community

By DANIEL HOROWITZ

UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education (BJE) is investigating several options to provide tuition relief for Toronto's day school network.

• Government Assistance

Although the level of community support for Jewish education in Toronto exceeds amounts provided by other communities, continuing government support is essential for tuition fee stability, according to Dr. Seymour Epstein, Vice President, Education, UJA Federation. "In the context of the Canadian reality, government support for Jewish day schools is our right, and the lack of such is a gross injustice," says Epstein. "The financial viability of the schools will be greatly enhanced once the general studies part of the curriculum is funded by the government, as it should be."

Governments in other Canadian provinces, and some U.S. states, help to fund independent schools. Here in Ontario, the Equity in Education Tax Credit (EETC) provides tax relief implemented over five years, culminating with a 50 percent credit in 2006 and beyond. Without government funding, cautions BJE Chair Marshall Kesten, it will be virtually impossible to reduce tuition costs. "For this reason, the community must be vigilant in maintaining and increasing its dialogue with the government to ensure that the EETC will be maintained, and ultimately improved," he said.

• Early Enrollment

Another key factor in cost control is increasing the number of day school students who enter the system as early as possible, in senior kindergarten or Grade 1.

To that end, the BJE Research Committee, chaired by Karen Chisvin, recently hired Randal Schnoor, a sociologist who, over the course of the summer, will be conducting focus groups consisting of parents who will soon be making education decisions about their children, to determine how earlier enrollment could be encouraged.

"Parents need to be exposed to, and educated about, the benefits of choosing day school education for their children as early as possible," says Schnoor.

"The main thing we hope to learn from this study are ways we could add value to a Jewish education in Toronto," says Chisvin. "It is a qualitative research project to look at what parents take into account when considering whether or not to send their kids to Jewish day school."

• Neighbourhood Schools

"It is imperative that, through a rational geographic distribution of schools throughout the GTA, children will have access to a Jewish day school education, close to where they live," says Epstein. Through UJA Federation's Jewish Toronto Tomorrow (JTT) initiative and its capital expansion project, this is quickly becoming a reality. At its downtown campus, the new Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre houses the Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School, as well as the Downtown Jewish Community School.

At JTT's Central Campus in the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, there is a full pre-school program, as well as She'arim, a Jewish day school for children with learning disabilities.

Continuing northwards, the JTT Vaughan Campus, located at Bathurst and Weldrick, due for completion in 2006, will house a new branch of CHAT (Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto), as well as at least two elementary schools.

"These schools, spread throughout the GTA, increase our potential to attract Jewish children from different ideological perspectives, and from different sub-sectors of our population," says Epstein.

• Innovative Funding

The BJE is currently working with Partners for Excellence in Jewish Education (PEJE), to provide new methods of maintaining vibrant and healthy schools and innovative funding alternatives.

PEJE-BJE coordinated workshops will provide advice on how schools can develop effective business plans while increasing access, by concentrating on the following solutions:

- Training and consultation on school fundraising
- Acquiring endowment funds
- Research, marketing and advertising designed to attract more entry-level students
- Training on school governance: effective utilization of school boards and new leadership recruitment.

$8 million in subsidies for new school year

Since the early 1970s, community subsidies provided by the UJA Federation annual campaign have been allocated to parents of children attending Jewish day schools. Over the past 10 years, more than 26,000 children in funded schools - ranging from first grade to OAC - have benefited from this funding.

The subsidies are administered by each individual school based on guidelines set by the Board of Jewish Education, which take into account several factors including family size and income. Subsidies range from nominal amounts to full tuition.

For the 2003-2004 school year, UJA Federation will be allocating nearly $8 million toward tuition subsidies – an increase of $900,000 over last year. The UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education will also be reviewing guidelines to determine ways in which more financial relief can be provided to middle-class income earners, such as one parent who, in a letter to the BJE, wrote, "...the middle-class of day school oriented parents is simply being squeezed to the limit and beyond. Some opt out, which is an unspeakable tragedy to Jewish continuity. Others like myself will persist at all costs..."

"It is precisely because we feel the pain and frustration of two very important groups that we work so diligently towards increased access for all members of the Jewish community," says Dr. Seymour Epstein, UJA Federation's Vice President of Jewish Education. "One, middle-class parents who are currently making great sacrifices in the day school system, and two, those who so sadly have – from the outset – not opted for Jewish education because of the high cost."

HRDC helps survivors apply for pensions

A simple call to HRDC to provide basic information is enough to meet the deadline. If lines are busy, applicants should leave their name and number, and the date and time they called, and "that will be treated as intent to apply," said Marla Israel, HRDC's director of international operations.

Canada is "one of the very few governments" helping survivors apply for the so-called "ghetto pensions" without having to deal directly with Germany, said Ron Singer, director of communications for Canadian Jewish Congress. He added that HRDC "has been supportive on a number of issues and pension agreements that affect Holocaust survivors in Canada."

(The ghetto pension should not be confused with an agreement last summer between Canada and Germany extending pension benefits to German-speaking Jews driven from their eastern and central European homes in the 1930s and '40s.)

Survivors who worked in ghettos, as well as their widows and widowers, are eligible for the pensions, even if they have already received compensation for slave labour or from the Conference of Jewish Material Claims Against Germany.

The pension payment is not for forced or slave labour, but the definition of voluntary labour is complicated. It includes Jews who volunteered for work in factories, fields and mines, but did not receive monetary remuneration. Often, they received food vouchers or worked for lodgings. And they often volunteered to avoid death.

Nevertheless, employers who used Jewish labour from the ghettos paid into German government pension funds, making the labourers eligible.

Ed Tamagno, HRDC's director general of international affairs, said payments will vary depending on the type of work performed, but could reach $250 a month.

Applications are invited from anyone who is 65 and older; lived in a ghetto occupied by, or incorporated into, the Third Reich; and performed voluntary labour for payment or was compensated in some form for their work. According to the U.S.-based National Association of Jewish Holocaust Survivors, applications are also invited from anyone who has already received restitution under the Article 2 Fund; was under 14 while in the ghetto; worked outside the ghetto but had to return each night; has been previously rejected for the pension; or was in a ghetto for a short time.

A handbook on how to apply for ghetto pensions can be downloaded from www.claimscon.org. A letter of application is also sufficient to meet the deadline, and Canadians can apply by faxing a letter to LVA Hamburg at 011-49-40-53-00-2999.

It should include basic details such as name, age, place of birth, location, period of time in the ghetto and job performed.

Birthright numbers hit record, up 280%

Zac Kaye, executive director of Hillel of Greater Toronto, which recruits students to Birthright, said student interest has "exploded. It's been a zoo here" as people try to enrol on the August trips.

Students perceive that the security situation is improving in Israel, and rumours have been circulating that this could be Birthright's last year of operation, he said. (The rumours may stem from the Israeli government's recent announcement that due to budget constraints, it would significantly reduce its contribution to Birthright. That decision was subsequently reversed.)

Mostly, news about Birthright travels by word of mouth. "It really is a grapevine at work and the program is readily perceived as something positive. It created a wave," he said.

Sokolsky said Birthright's numbers had decreased after its initial, pre-intifadah popularity, and now a pent-up demand is manifesting itself.

"[Going to Israel] is becoming the thing to do again," she said.

Some students see Birthright as helping them better deal with anti-Israel agitation on campus. "They see in people who come back a confidence level that they may be lacking," Sokolsky said.

Almost two-thirds of the summer's travellers hail from Toronto, while the second largest group (20 per cent) comes from Montreal.

Five hundred are enrolled at one of Toronto's universities – 80 per cent of them attend York – with smaller contingents from Seneca College and Ryerson University. The University of Western Ontario, Concordia University and McGill University provide the next largest groups of participants.

Since February 2000, 5,264 Canadian have visited Israel on Birthright trips.

In related news, Birthright organizers have been told to more carefully scrutinize applicants after seven Americans on Birthright trips were found to be ineligible because of age or earlier visits. The seven were sent home after landing in Israel earlier this month.

THE DINING GUIDE

ADVERTISING FEATURE

The Lobster Trap Restaurant

1962 Avenue Rd. • 416-787-3211

Hours: Lunch Mon.-Fri. 12:00noon–2:00p.m.
Dinner 7 days a week 5p.m.-10p.m.,
Licensed. No reservations. Non-smoking.

At 37 years, this is Toronto's longest-lasting and best-known lobster establishment. As the name implies, they feature lobsters — one to four pounds, live in tanks and fresh, prepared whatever way you like them. Also, they offer other fine seafoods and fish, such as Alaska king crab legs; for meat eaters, there are tasty items like filet mignon or chicken breast; and there is a kids' menu. The ambience is casual and friendly; most of the tables are booths, for privacy and comfort. The decor brings to mind a fisherman's cabin, with its traps, buoys and abalone shells on the walls.

Baton Rouge Restaurant

216 Yonge St.
Toronto Eaton Centre
Reservations: 416-593-9667

Hours: Mon.–Thurs. 11a.m.–11p.m.
Fri. & Sat. 11a.m.–midnight
Sun. noon–10p.m.
Wheelchair access.

One of Montreal's leading restaurant chains, Baton Rouge features ribs, steaks, burgers and pastas. Everything here tastes of quality. The beef is Stirling Silver, Canada's #1 grade. The ribs, after 12 hours' slow baking and char-broiling, literally fall off the bone; you can eat them without using your fingers. The meat is aged in-house and fish selected daily; sauces and dressings are also made fresh daily. You'll love the mahogany interior, with its deep, rich reds; Frank Sinatra and Billy Halliday seranade. Come for dinner before the theatre, and return for dessert after.

Trapper's Restaurant

3479 Yonge St., Tor. • 416-482-6211
www.toronto.com/trappersrestaurant
Lunch Mon.-Fri. 11:30a.m. - 2:30p.m.
Dinner Mon.-Thurs. 5p.m.-9p.m., Fri. & Sat. 5p.m.-10p.m.
Non-smoking. Partial wheelchair access

Among the tastes Trapper's has created to tempt you, are charcoal grilled Black Angus steaks, Atlantic salmon, Orange Roughy, bouillabaisse, Alberta veal chops, Muskoka trout, PEI mussels, and roast breast of Broom Lake duck. It's Canadian-Continental cuisine, with a little international touch. The atmosphere is elegantly casual, ideal for an intimate romantic dinner. In 2001, Where magazine recommended them for the best wine list, and gave them the Most Memorable Meal award; and the Zaggatt survey of quality meals rated them excellent. Trapper's caters, and hosts private functions such as bar/bat mitzvahs or wedding rehearsals.

Furama House

100 Steeles Ave. W. • 905-731-3288

Hours: 10a.m.–11p.m., Dim Sum 10-4, 7 days.
Eat-in or take out. Licensed. Wheelchair access.
Reservations recommended.

Want to savour authentic, extra-special Chinese food, in a skylit setting amid crafted wood carvings? For Toronto's most superb dim sum, or delicious low-fat Cantonese and Szechuan cuisine, visit Bobbie Peng's Furama House. You'll love his Cantonese lobster, braised, sprinkled with canola oil, stir-fried and sprayed with eggwhite. You'll also be delighted by his tender, juicy 1 1/2 lb. Vancouver Tangen crab.

UNICEF chair receives key Hamilton award

By PHYLLIS SHRAGGE
Special to The CJN

HAMILTON – Laura Ludwin, named woman of the year in the category of public affairs by the Hamilton Status of Women Committee last month, has made a lifelong commitment to volunteerism because she is passionate about helping children.

Her role as chairperson of the board of UNICEF Canada and her involvement with the Hamilton Council of Home and School Associations grew out of an awareness of children's needs that she developed while growing up in South Africa.

Ludwin said in an interview that when she was a child, her family stressed the importance of being involved with the community. A commitment to activism was also encouraged by her Hebrew school and solidified by her participation in the Habonim movement.

"By the time I got to high school, I was becoming politically aware. I was very aware of disparities," she said.

When Ludwin moved to Hamilton in 1982, one of the first things she did was look for the Hamilton UNICEF office because she wanted to send out UNICEF change-of-address cards. She discovered that UNICEF did not have an office in Hamilton.

Refusing to settle for any other type of card, Ludwin phoned the Toronto UNICEF office and demanded to know why UNICEF cards were not available in Hamilton.

A spokesperson for the Toronto office said there was no one in Hamilton to sell the cards and asked if she would take on the job.

"That's how I got started. I sold cards from my house. At one point, I had $30,000 worth of cards in my basement."

Ludwin's role with UNICEF as a card seller led to further involvement with the organization. She began to promote UNICEF by speaking to schools and community groups. Her leadership role grew as she became the regional chair, member of the Ontario provincial executive, Ontario provincial chair and member of the board of UNICEF Canada.

Her involvement with the organization has taken her on trips to such places as Mali, West Africa, and to Cambodia, Thailand and Slovenia.

The mission of UNICEF is to help ensure the survival, growth and long-term development of the world's underserved children and to serve as their advocates. In Canada, other agencies protect children's rights, so UNICEF focuses on education here, she said.

Ludwin refuted the notion of UNICEF being anti-Semitic.

"Many people think UNICEF is anti-Semitic, which it isn't. It never has been. We've always been in Israel. There is a committee in Israel doing peace studies and seeing that prejudices are not being taught in schools.

"I wouldn't be doing this [volunteering] of there was any hint that UNICEF was anti-Israel."

In recognition of her efforts, the Canadian Association of Communicators in Education presented Ludwin and the planning committee with the Bravo Award of Excellence.

Edmonton Jewish film fest a success

By TAMARA STECYK
Special to The CJN

EDMONTON — After its second successful year, the Edmonton Jewish Film Festival continues to receive high praise and there's growing pressure to expand the event from two days to four in 2004.

But festival co-chair Michael Saouli said he is hesitant because he only wants to show the best films.

"I don't want to become a film festival of quantity," Saouli said, adding people should expect to see outstanding movies instead.

This year's festival screened four films, two each on June 11 and 12. Poor weather in March 2002 led organizers to schedule this year's festival later in the spring. As a result, organizers said, some 1,000 people in total attended this year, up from 900 last year.

The four films were screened at the West Edmonton Mall's Cineplex Odeon theatres, with two lighter movies shown the first night and two heavier films reserved for the following evening.

Saouli, who is a producer for Alliance Atlantis, said he was surprised to be able to get such top quality films again for the festival.

Time of Favor, the 2001 winner of six Israeli Academy Awards, opened the festival. The Hebrew drama tells the story of the commander of a combat unit comprised of Orthodox soldiers who falls in love with his rabbi's daughter and becomes torn between his feelings and his duty as a soldier.

But the film that drew the most praise was the uplifting comedy Monsieur Batignole. Set in 1942, the French film with English subtitles tells the story of Edmond Batignole, a Parisian butcher who abandons his attempt to avoid trouble when a young Jewish boy named Simon appears in his life during the Nazi occupation of France. Actor Jean-Paul Rouve, who plays Simon, won a 2003 French César award for most male promising actor.

Saouli said next year's festival may be moved to a different theatre to accommodate more people.

He estimates this year's profit to be more than $20,000. It will be used to help the Edmonton Jewish Federation's Partnership 2000 project called Living Bridges. Living Bridges is a student exchange program between communities in northern Israel and Edmonton.

Group leaves Ottawa shul over mixed seating

By LAUREN KRUGEL
CJN Intern

Some ex-members of Congregation Beth Shalom in downtown Ottawa plan to start their own shul after 70 per cent of the congregation voted in April to secede from the Orthodox Union and allow mixed seating in the main sanctuary.

The group of about 40 to 50 people, which calls itself the Ottawa Downtown Orthodox Minyan (ODOM), has been davening in the party room of a downtown apartment building for the past year and is seeking a permanent home for the new congregation.

"Orthodox is Orthodox. You either are or you aren't. What are we supposed to do?" said Ian Sadinsky, a member of the breakaway group who was Beth Shalom's president from 1996-2000 and a shul member for nearly 30 years.

Jack Shapiro, Beth Shalom's current president, said the shul is looking into joining the Union for Traditional Judaism (UTJ). The UTJ's president, Rabbi Bruce Ginsberg, and its vice-president, Rabbi Ronald Price, said in a recent letter to The CJN the UTJ is "about promoting increased commitment to tradition" and supports synagogues with and without mechitzahs.

Shapiro said because many Jews have moved from downtown to Ottawa's west end, Beth Shalom hopes to boost membership by letting men and women sit together and by embracing UTJ principles. He said most of the shul's founding members have died and many of their children are less observant than their parents.

He said the congregation has about 450 member families, roughly half the number it had 25 years ago.

Aside from the move to mixed seating, Beth Shalom will maintain Orthodox kashrut standards and liturgy. However, bnot mitzvah will now be allowed to read haftarot, but will not be permitted to read from the Torah.

"For some people, that's sufficient, but it's not truly Orthodox," said ODOM member Chuck Rotenberg.

Since mixed seating came into effect the Saturday after Shavuot, several people have joined or have made inquiries into joining, Shapiro said.

"If the membership we get follows the number of inquiries we've had, that will be fantastic," he said, adding he anticipates more people will join as the High Holy Days approach.

In a May 2002 poll of Beth Shalom members, about two-thirds approved of the shul leaving the OU. Beth Shalom has made contact with the UTJ but has yet to officially join, Shapiro said.

In June 2002, a group of members opposed to mixed seating founded ODOM. They applied to Canada Customs and Revenue Agency to become a charitable trust in order to establish themselves as a legal entity.

Shapiro said Beth Shalom tried to accommodate the minority by setting aside the shul's chapel for an Orthodox minyan.

But Rabbi Eli Braun, the shul's former spiritual leader who left in January when his contract expired and Beth Shalom's new direction was becoming clear, said the synagogue was only prepared to allow the minyan to hold Shacharit and Minchah/Ma'ariv services every day but Shabbat, when the only morning service was to be held in the main sanctuary.

He said if Beth Shalom intended to allow the Orthodox minyan to be independent, it would have given the minyan full control over its davening times.

"It is a dishonest farce," Rabbi Braun said. "It's all an issue of control."

Cantor Yair Subar said he also left in January when his contract expired because the synagogue is no longer "acceptable according to Jewish law."

Beth Shalom is seeking replacements for Rabbi Braun and Subar, Shapiro said.

Rotenberg said efforts to have ODOM and Beth Shalom share the same property have been unsuccessful.

Last summer, he said, Beth Shalom and ODOM tried to reach an agreement to have a third party, a secular entity, own the shul building, in order to comply with a ruling by the Union of Orthodox Rabbis of the United States and Canada that holds "it is forbidden to give any support, moral or financial, to any synagogue which has no proper mechitzah."

The plan collapsed last fall because Beth Shalom pushed for a clause that would have allowed the partnership to be terminated with six months notice, potentially leaving ODOM without a home.

Rotenberg, a tax and corporate lawyer, said there are legal issues involved in the move away from Orthodoxy. He said a "significant body of case law" says a vote to fundamentally change the purpose of a religious building must be approved unanimously by its congregation.

He said planning documents from 1946 said the building was to be used for an Orthodox synagogue with a mechitzah.

The synagogue could theoretically be sued, Rotenberg said. He and Sadinsky wouldn't comment on whether they will take legal action against the shul, but Rotenberg said some ODOM members are considering it.

Shapiro said he consulted lawyers throughout the process who didn't consider legal precedents to be an issue.

Sadinsky said he disagrees with the contention that a strictly Orthodox synagogue in Ottawa can't attract young members. He says ODOM members vary in age, background and profession.

"We have what Beth Shalom claims that they want," he said.

Jewish environmental society wins award

By PETER CAULFIELD
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — A Jewish environmental group has won this year's City of Vancouver Mayor's Environmental Achievement Award.

The Adam va-Adamah Environmental Society works to protect the environment and educate British Columbians about Judaism's deeply rooted environmental values. Mayor Larry Campbell presented the award to the Vancouver-based group on June 10 during Canadian Environment Week.

"This award reflects the important work Adam va-Adamah does in educating residents in the Lower Mainland, and the close connections between Judaism and the environment," said AvA chair Steve Lipari. "Our programs contribute to a better environment for all who live here."

Founded in 1998, Adam va-Adamah (meaning "man and the earth") is the British Columbia affiliate of the Coalition on the Environment and Jewish Life (COEJL), a network of 14 Jewish environmental groups across North America.

The organization develops programs that demonstrate how Jewish environmental values can be applied to daily life. Examples include a program that was developed with the help of the Farm Folk/City Folk Society that shows the connection between Sukkot and topical agricultural issues, such as organics; a program that highlights the environmental themes of Tu b'Shvat, the Festival of Trees; and an energy conservation program called "Eight Days, Eight Actions" that ties in with Chanukah.

For the past four years, AvA has collaborated with the First Nations' Ut'sam/Witness Program to offer a Wilderness Shabbaton. The weekend program combines observance of Shabbat with education about the environment and First Nations culture and spiritual traditions. AvA also holds an annual eco-retreat at the Sunwolf Outdoor Centre, which is located near Squamish.

AvA's programs have attracted more than 2,000 participants during the last 18 months.

Mulroney draws 900 to Montreal Negev Dinner

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – Former prime minister Brian Mulroney was in his element at this year's Jewish National Fund Montreal Negev Dinner.

Before delivering a passionate defence of Israel and the Jewish people and a blistering condemnation of anti-Semitism to a black-tie crowd of 900 at the Queen Elizabeth Hotel, Mulroney, 63, spent more than an hour at pre-dinner cocktails posing amiably for photos, chatting with guests and generally turning on his politician's charm.

Accompanied by his wife Mila, 50, and youngest son Nicolas, Mulroney accepted JNF's Man of the Year award and won round after round of applause for his address.

Speaking June 11, the same day a Hamas suicide bomber killed 16 in Jerusalem, Mulroney wondered how the world would react to a similar incident in Canada or the United States.

"Canada – 96 dead and 600 injured. United States – 960 dead, 3,000 injured.

"What do you think we would say then? Would we move on to other things or would we deal with terrorism in the only manner possible: implacable and unflinching opposition to the people and institutions that initiate, encourage or condone such acts of violence against innocent men, women and children."

Mulroney, who served as prime minister from 1984 to 1993 and became leader of the federal Tory party 20 years earlier to the day of the dinner – praised Canada's Jewish community, defended his government's record on Israel – describing it as the most supportive of Israel in Canadian history – and recounted Canada's lamentable track record in its treatment of Jews.

Much of Mulroney's speech echoed his February address at the University of Toronto that won him kudos and made him the JNF's choice for Negev honoree.

Mulroney said he was distressed by the "incomprehensible resurgence" of anti-Semitism.

"Contemporary anti-Semitism, without changing its stripes, has added Israel as [one of] its targets. Israel has in effect become the 'new Jew,'" said Mulroney, now a senior partner with law firm Ogilvy Renault.

Mulroney said he rejected suggestions his government should be "evenhanded" regarding Israel.

"It struck me as a code that meant Israel ran a serious risk, in the crunch, of getting shafted and I was determined to change Canadian policy to ensure that [would] not happen."

He said he was determined to treat Israel as a true ally and not be a "fair-weather friend." He also reminded the crowd he was the first prime minister to appoint three successive Jewish chiefs of staff.

He also noted that he appointed Canada's first Jewish ambassador to Israel, Norman Spector, in order to reject the "odious myth of dual loyalty."

Mulroney said Israel should not be immune from criticism, but added that Canada should also speak out against any country that shows "hostility or malice to Israel or the Jews."

Volunteers honoured in nation's capital

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Bernard Dolansky is this year's recipient of the Gilbert Greenberg Distinguished Service Award, the highest volunteer award presented by the Ottawa Jewish Community.

The award was presented to Dolansky at the 69th annual general meeting of the Jewish Community Council of Ottawa/Vaad Ha'Ir, at the Soloway Jewish Community Centre June 11.

Named for late Vaad Ha'Ir president Gilbert Greenberg, the award recognizes exceptional service over many years.

Jackie (Tick) Barwin arrived in Ottawa from Hamilton as a bride in 1991 and immersed herself in her new community. Her dedicated volunteerism, in particular with Hadassah-WIZO and the UJA Young Women's Leadership Council, earned her the 2003 Freiman Family Young Leadership Award and the Lawrence Greenberg Young Leadership Development Award. The latter will enable her to attend the United Jewish Communities General Assembly this fall in Jerusalem.

Longtime volunteer Evelyn Greenberg was the first recipient of the new Shem Tov Community Volunteer Award. Over the years, Greenberg has used her musical talent to bring cheer to the ill and infirm at hospitals and seniors' homes. The pianist and professional accompanist has also played with guest soloists at fundraisers for a variety of Jewish organizations. As well, she was founder and first co-chair of the Ottawa branch of the Canada-Israel Cultural Foundation and was instrumental in starting the Hebrew University-University of Ottawa academic exchange.

Also at the meeting, recognition was given to Norman Barwin, general chair of the 2003 UJA campaign, and to Ingrid Levitz, chair of the 2003 UJA Women's Campaign, for their dedication and success in raising funds.

In votes for officers and trustees-at-large, Arnie Vered was elected to succeed Gerald Levitz as Vaad Ha'Ir president. In his inaugural address, Vered praised the dedication of community volunteers and professional staff.

Housing board aims to complete new projects

By PETER CAULFIELD
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — The new executive and board of the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver's Non-Profit Housing Society have their work cut out for them, says David Berson, the federation's director of community planning.

"The cost of housing in Vancouver is the highest in Canada," Berson said. "There is a 'hot' market here for both market and non-market housing. The Jewish community in Vancouver has few options for affordable housing and there is a strong consensus that housing for seniors, new immigrants and families, particularly single parent families, is critical."

The new executive of NPHS is led by Gabe Bandel (president) and includes Rozanne Kipnes (vice-president), Allan Tapper (secretary), George Sommer (treasurer) and Jerry Kushner (past president). The society also recently elected a new board that includes professionals and individuals with experience in affordable housing for seniors and people with special needs.

The NPHS was formed in 1994. Registered under the B.C. Societies Act, the society is mandated to acquire and manage housing that meets the needs of the Lower Mainland's Jewish community, educate the community and local agencies about housing issues and conduct research on housing needs and services.

In recent years, community activists have discovered that many Jews in Greater Vancouver are living in straitened circumstances. The federation estimates that at least one in six members of the Lower Mainland Jewish community live on limited incomes. About one-half of this group is paying too much for accommodations. In addition, it is difficult for many Jews of limited means to find affordable housing that doesn't isolate them from the rest of the Jewish community. Approximately 200 to 300 Jewish households are in need of housing every year.

Bandel challenged the board to set a goal of at least one new completed housing project in the next year.

"It will require diligent work by new subcommittees working on land acquisition, fund raising and social planning," Bandel said. "People need affordable housing with access to their community in order to maintain and strengthen their cultural and ethnic identity."

Hamilton's Rabbi Silverman known as great intellect

By PHYLLIS SHRAGGE
Hamilton Correspondent

HAMILTON — Rabbi Israel Silverman, rabbi emeritus of Beth Jacob Synagogue, a scholar and rabbinic leader, died June 16 at age 74.

Spiritual leader of Beth Jacob from 1966 until his retirement in 1996, Rabbi Silverman was known as a great intellect who was a master of the sermon, in both content and delivery.

Obituary

Rabbi Silverman was determined to be a scholar at a young age, and he succeeded, said Rabbi Abraham Kelman, Rabbi Silverman's brother-in-law.

"He was more than a good student, he was a superb student. He loved Torah and he mastered the Hebrew language," Rabbi Kelman told the large crowd of mourners at the funeral service at Beth Jacob Synagogue.

In her eulogy, one of a number presented by family members, Rabbi Silverman's daughter Riva said, "My father, above all else, was a great teacher. Many learned from his brilliant sermons each Shabbat and holiday. Others were privileged to study with him in smaller classes. But for his family, we had a chance to learn from him day in and day out from watching him and seeing how he lived his life.

"We will never understand why God chose to take our father from us now when he had so much more to teach us, and we should not ask why. Rather, it is up to each of us to ask 'Eicha? How?' How can we take the lessons of such a profound life and make ourselves and the world around us better for it? The gaping hole in our lives will never be repaired, but if we ensure the continuation of his legacy, his memory surely will be for a blessing."

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl of Beth Tzedec Synagogue in Toronto led the funeral service, which was attended by rabbis from Toronto, Ottawa and the United States. Rabbi Morton Leifman, dean emeritus of the cantorial school at the Jewish Thelogical Seminary, chanted the memorial prayer for the departed, concluding the service.

As a student at the Jewish Theological Seminary of America, Rabbi Silverman studied with the great rabbis of the Conservative Movement, including Mordecai Kaplan, Saul Lieberman, Louis Finkelstein, and Abraham Joshua Heschel.

He was scholar-in-residence at Camp Ramah in Canada and former chair of the committee on Jewish Law and Standards of the Rabbinical Assembly of Conservative Judaism. He was head of the Canadian Conservative Movement Bet Din (rabbinic court) and a member of Va'ad HaKavod (disciplinary committee) of the Rabbinical Assembly.

Rabbi Silverman was born in Montreal, where he graduated from Sir George Williams University (now Concordia University). He was ordained at the Jewish Theological Seminary of America in 1954 and assumed the position of assistant rabbi to Rabbi Robert Gordis of Temple Beth-El, Rockaway Park, Long Island, N.Y. In 1955, he became rabbi of Temple Beth Zion in Brookline, Mass., a position he held for nine years.

He was president of the New England region Rabbinical Assembly from 1961 to 1964. In 1964, he became registrar of the Graduate Rabbinical School of the Jewish Theological Seminary, a position he held until taking on the role of spiritual leader of Beth Jacob Synagogue in Hamilton in 1966.

From 1974 to 1976, he served as president of the Ontario region Rabbinical Assembly, and in 1980, he was awarded an honorary doctor of divinity degree from the Jewish Theological Seminary of America. He received the Max Arzt Memorial Rabbinic Service Award in 1996.

In a telephone interview, Rabbi Mordechai Green, rabbi emeritus of Adas Israel Synagogue, said that in recent months, Rabbi Silverman often reminisced about his days at Telshe Yeshiva, recalling his relationships with the great rabbis. He felt rooted in tradition and that gave him a sense of inner tranquillity because he felt a sense of connectedness, Rabbi Green said.

As well as being a scholar, "he was a great father and a great source of inspiration for his family. He was a gentle person with a good sense of humour."

Rabbi Bernard Baskin, rabbi emeritus of Temple Anshe Sholom, said, "Rabbi Silverman was an outstanding scholar as well as rabbi who ministered to his congregation and the community for many years with great faithfulness.

"He was ecumenical in his approach to both Jewish and non-Jewish life, finding some common ground with non-Conservative rabbis as well as with members of the outside larger community. He was especially close to his family and spent time with many members of the community in imparting the wisdom that he had gleaned from his years at the Jewish Theological Seminary and as a spiritual leader. He will be sorely missed in the entire community."

"He was one of the earliest influences on my decision and the decision of many of my colleagues to enter the rabbinate," said Rabbi Lionel Moses, spiritual leader of Shaare Zion Synagogue in Montreal.

"He was considered the senior expert on Jewish divorce law in the entire Conservative Movement."

Rabbi Silverman leaves his wife Gloria, and children, Judah, Lanie, Aviva, Riva and Devorah, and their spouses Margo Silverman, Dr. Joel Goldberg, Dr. Mark Smiley, Abram Heisler and Reuben Rotman, as well as 16 grandchildren.

Woman converts diaries into book for cancer caregivers

By ELYSSE ZAREK
CJN Intern

Over the years, Marcia Schnoor has filled many roles: wife, mother, sister, grandmother, friend, artist and insurance agent. But when her husband Jack was diagnosed with cancer – malignant melanoma – in the summer of 1997, she took on the role of caregiver as well.

Jack had retired from his job six months earlier and the couple had been looking forward to enjoying their retirement years. The diagnosis changed everything.

For three years, they lived and breathed doctors' appointments, treatment plans and medication regimens. Schnoor kept a journal of everything that happened, tracing the steps of her husband's illness and her own response to it.

When Jack died in January of 2001, they had been married for 37 years. He was 66; she was 58.

To help herself cope with the loss and to help others in the same situation, Schnoor converted her journals into a book titled Transitions: Dealing with the Illness, Caregiving and Death of My Husband, published last month.

Schnoor found writing the book to be very therapeutic.

"The book was a summary of where I was at my life," she says. "It allowed me to think about all these issues that I was dealing with, the issues of loss and of adjustment to being single. I now had a new status in the community and I had to think of myself as being single after having been married for 37 years."

Schnoor writes that one of the most difficult things she had to do was tell her two adult children that their father had a terminal disease. "My daughter Cindy said, 'Mom and Dad, you have looked after us all these years. We are now adult children, and we are there for you both and will look after you.'"

'The scourge of cancer is touching so many people'

Schnoor quickly realized that in addition to caring for Jack, she had to look after herself as well. She credits a combination of yoga, meditation, art classes and strong friendships for keeping her going.

She also made a point of getting out of the house at least a few hours every day. While she was out, a home-care worker took care of Jack, but she never went far and always had a cellphone with her.

"When you're going through that really tough caregiver role, it is important to take time for yourself and to try not to feel guilty about doing that because the caregiving role is onerous and very difficult," she says.

The changes in her family came quickly. Her son took Jack's empty place at the dinner table, while her daughter prepared her children for their grandfather's death.

After Jack died, Schnoor worried about how she would cope on her own and about how her children and grandchildren would deal with the new change in their family. Even the house seemed quiet with only one person living in it.

The change shook her world.

"It's a struggle to know who I am now," she says. "I'm no longer a wife, but I still have a lot of other attributes and I'm still a worthwhile person in my own right. I'm still a mother, a sister, a grandmother, I'm a friend and I can contribute in the general community as a volunteer. I saw myself as still having value even though I was no longer part of a couple."

Once the shivah ended, Schnoor took up offers to visit out-of-town friends and relatives. She went to New York, San Francisco and Arizona and welcomed the change of scenery.

Schnoor now makes plans in order to give herself something to look forward to. "I try to involve myself in activities and keep busy. I'm searching for how to use my time in a fulfilling manner."

For her 60th birthday last September, Schnoor decided that instead of a party or a gift, she wanted to spend quality time with friends. She and her daughter arranged to send out invitations to friends, inviting them to call and make plans to see her. Her birthday-related activities lasted several months.

Schnoor knows that while each caregiver's story is unique, she hopes the suggestions in her book, such as trying yoga and meditation, can be used by others.

"The scourge of cancer is touching so many people," she writes.

The Canadian Cancer Society estimates that 140,000 people will be diagnosed with cancer this year and 67,000 will die of the disease.

Schnoor's book was published by Wellspring, a network of support centres for people with cancer and their loved ones, and is available at Princess Margaret Hospital, Sunnybrook Regional Cancer Centre and at Wellspring locations.

ADD fails to slow 67-year-old author

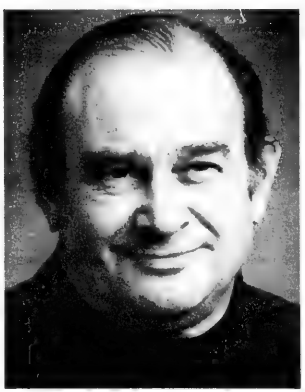
By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Alvin Abram says he learned early in life that if you have a lemon, you have to learn to make lemonade.

The 67-year-old author, speaker, businessman and award-winning volunteer has coped with Attention Deficit Disorder (ADD) since childhood and has faced a number of crises head on.

He married Marilyn Epstein in 1960, and together they have handled Alvin's five heart attacks, Marilyn's bout with breast cancer and other challenges.

But he has emerged as a success in his personal, business and creative endeavours. Abram's most recent book, The Unlikely Victims: A Gabe Garshowitz Mystery (AMA Graphics Incorporated, Toronto), was shortlisted by the Crime Writers of Canada for the Arthur Ellis Award for the best first novel in 2002.



Alvin Abram

In The Unlikely Victims, Abram's fourth book, six cases are solved by Detective Gabe Garshowitz, a hard-boiled, arthritic, chauvinistic 30-year veteran of the Toronto police force who is partnered with Detective Iris Forester, an attractive young divorcée half his age who is driven to prove herself in a field of tough-minded men.

The readers are thrown into local Toronto street scenes where they come across characters with familiar names and learn about Garshowitz's personal conflicts as he attempts to cope with his guilt over the suicide of his wife, a Holocaust survivor, and to deal with his daughter who holds him responsible.

Abram's ADD allows him to concentrate for only up to 20 minutes at a time. At school, he was labelled a dreamer by his teachers. "I had to learn very early in life how to cope." Things must be visual for him, he says.

"Over the years, I lived my life in books," he says. "My mind is like a firecracker. It is always lighting up."

His interest in literature came partly from father, Herman Abramovitz, who was the editor of Vochenblatt, the workers' newspaper.

However, Abram says his mother, Annie Abramovitz, who worked in a Spadina Avenue sweatshop, had the most profound influence on him.

"Never forget your dreams, Alvin," she told him. "But you must learn to live in today's world as well. Maybe, someday, you'll be able to use your gift so everyone can enjoy your dreams."

The dreamer and loner attended Charles G. Fraser Public School where, he says, "I got strapped at least once a month because I was in la la land."

He went to Central Technical High School, and, "after four years, I got my diploma on condition that I promise never to come back," he says.

He then opened his business, AMA Printers, in a room in Parkdale Press in downtown Toronto, and later moved to Finch Avenue, where he ran the company until 2000.

In 1995, Abram decided he wanted to put his dreams on paper, and he took a creative writing course at York University.

Since then, he has written poetry, short stories and a collection of true tales of courage and survival.

More than 30 of his stories and articles have been published, including Why, Zaida?, the story of a Holocaust survivor who answers his grandson's questions about the Holocaust by using metaphors from nature.

His first full-length book, The Light After the Dark, was published in 1998. All the royalties from that book, more than $16,000, have been donated to Jewish community charities.

Abram is currently compiling a new book, an anthology titled Stories I Wrote, containing 18 of his stories that were published in newspapers and magazines since 1995.

His books are available at most book stores throughout Canada, or by e-mail at bubbameinsa@yahoo.com.

Violence flares in Israel as U.S. sends envoys

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — This week's events had a familiar ring to them: the United States dispatched envoys to the Middle East and daily violence showed little sign of abating.

The violence flared again last Saturday, when Israeli troops killed a senior Hamas leader in Hebron.

Abdullah Kawasme was held responsible by Israel for attacks in which some 50 Israelis were killed.

The killing of Kawasme followed last Friday's shooting near Ramallah in which Israeli American Zvi Goldstein, 47, was killed, and his parents and wife injured.

Hamas claimed responsibility for the attack.

Speaking Sunday in Jordan, U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell expressed concern that Israel's killing of Kawasme could impede progress on the U.S.-backed "road map" for peace.

"It is still important to remain committed to moving forward," he told a news conference in Jordan, after members of the "Quartet" – the United States, Russia, European Union and United Nations – met to discuss ways to keep the road map on track.

Israeli security sources said Sunday night that the United States had clarified that Powell's remarks were not a condemnation of the Israeli action, the daily Ha'aretz reported.

The World Economic Forum, held in Jordan this past weekend, gave U.S. officials a platform for maintaining a presence to advance implementation of the road map.

The U.S. assistant secretary for Near Eastern affairs, William Burns, who took part in the meeting, was expected to visit Israel and the Palestinian Authority (PA) this week.

U.S. National Security Adviser Condoleezza Rice was also expected to visit the region this week or this weekend.

Powell's remarks came two days after he called Hamas an "enemy of peace," and said the PA must do more than just negotiate a ceasefire with the group, but must "end violence and the capacity for violence."

Powell, who met separately last Friday with Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and PA Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas, said he stressed to Abbas that Palestinian terrorism must end.

"Violence and terror is not the way to build a state," he said, adding that the sight of their own forces maintaining security might give Palestinians "confidence that organizations such as Hamas and other terrorist organizations perhaps do not have the right answer."

Kawasme, one of the most senior Palestinian militants in the territories, was shot by Israeli special forces when he tried to resist arrest, according to army officials.

But Palestinian sources said he was standing outside when he was shot by the undercover troops, reports said.

On Sunday, Sharon called the killing a "successful and important" operation whose purpose was to ensure the security of Israelis. Speaking at the weekly Cabinet meeting, he said Israel would engage in such operations as long as the Palestinians do not assume security responsibility in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

If the PA is unable to take such responsibility, "we will act to safeguard Israeli security," Sharon was quoted as saying.

Sharon's statements came amid reports that Israel and the Palestinians were close to agreement on a proposal to transfer security responsibility to the PA in the Gaza Strip and the West Bank town of Bethlehem.

Under the proposal, Israel would give the Palestinians three to six weeks to organize.

Observers have suggested that a deal would hinge on progress in ceasefire contacts between the PA and Palestinian groups, primarily Hamas.

Abbas has said he will not use force against Hamas to stop terror.

But Israeli Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz, an open critic of the road map, has accused the PA of using the ceasefire efforts as a way to disguise their lack of commitment to take genuine action against terrorism.

Mofaz was quoted as telling the Cabinet on Sunday that Israel would ultimately have to "launch an active" war on Hamas.

It was not immediately clear how the latest killing would affect the diplomatic efforts.

Ducking international criticism for its policy of targeted killings, Israel said its focus was on "ticking bombs," and reiterated its position that it will continue to defend its citizens as long as the Palestinians do not take security responsibility and crack down on the terrorist infrastructure.

Israel has described Kawasme as the "father" of terrorist attacks and pointed to his responsibility for the deaths of Israelis in recent strikes, including a June 11 suicide bus bombing on Jerusalem's Jaffa Street, a May bus bombing in the city's French Hill neighbourhood and a March bus bombing in Haifa.

Birthright increases scrutiny of participants

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Birthright Israel is increasing its scrutiny of participants after several were removed from the country for supporting a pro-Palestinian group that backs armed struggle against Israel.

Three American Jews have been ordered out of Israel in the last few months after Birthright organizers found they joined the program under false pretenses. The removals preceded stepped-up security screening by Israel of young foreigners after two terrorists were linked to the International Solidarity Movement (ISM), a Palestinian-led group of foreign volunteers.

Gideon (Gidi) Mark, international director of marketing for Birthright Israel, acknowledged that "three people were detected who were suspicious and we sent them home immediately.

"We did not feel they really came for the purposes they declared," Mark said. "There were some rumours and as far as I know they immediately admitted they had other plans."

Birthright is a four-year-old program that brings young Jews to Israel on an all-expense paid educational and cultural trip. The program, which is designed to enhance young people's solidarity with Israel, is a joint partnership between the government of Israel, a number of Jewish philanthropists and diaspora communities. Participants must be between 18 and 26 and cannot have visited Israel on a previous tour.

In an article last month, the Israeli daily, Ha'aretz, reported that Laura Gordon, a 20-year-old American Jew from Pittsburgh, arrived in Israel last December as part of a Birthright group and within months, had become a spokesperson for the ISM.

Gordon told Ha'aretz that "some people, when they heard back in the [United] States, said I had betrayed Birthright by doing this, but Birthright does not come with a stipulation that you must espouse certain values."

While participating agencies have been asked to step up their vigilance in screening applicants, representatives of Birthright's Canadian operation said they have been doing so as a matter of course.

Elizabeth Sokolsky, vice-president of education and operations for Birthright in Toronto, said "every single applicants is interviewed before they are accepted."

Organizers generally meet with each applicant for up to 45 minutes during which they discuss a number of issues related to the trip and ensure people's goals are consistent with the Birthright agenda. "Trip organizers are sensitive and careful during interviews if anything red flags them," she said, adding that Birthright Canada has never run into an applicant who was attempting to misuse the program to enter Israel.

"This has definitely not been an in issue with Canadian kids," she said.

"Here in Canada, the system is very hands-on, direct system and would weed out people going there under false pretenses," Sokolsky added.

Israeli journalist David Bedein told The CJN that ISM volunteers hoped to enter Israel under the country's security radar by joining groups such as Birthright.

He said the ISM's Web site advises its volunteers to "have a really good story about why you are coming [to Israel] and not to mention anything about ISM, or knowing, liking or planning to visit Palestinians."

Bedein also claimed to have met, by chance, an Arab member of a Jewish-Palestinian friendship group in Florida who was well-known to security services in Israel and who was planning to enter the country as part of a federation mission.

International anti-Semitism conference a milestone

By RUTH E. GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

VIENNA — There was no escaping the irony. Sixty-five years ago, Adolf Hitler stood on a balcony in Vienna's Heldenplatz and triumphantly addressed hundreds of thousands of cheering Austrians after Nazi Germany annexed Austria into the Third Reich.

Last week, within earshot of that balcony, the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe held the first-ever international governmental conference exclusively about anti-Semitism.

The two-day meeting brought together nearly 400 delegates from the 55 member states of the OSCE, an international body founded in 1995 that grew out of the Cold War era's "Helsinki process" of human rights monitoring and conflict resolution.

The forum produced no concrete actions or resolutions. But the very fact it took place and recognized anti-Semitism as a unique form of prejudice that needs to be addressed on its own in an international context made it historic.

"We are making a statement that the time of denial is over," Hebrew University professor Robert Wistrich said.

Even more important, delegates said, was the prospect the issue would be addressed on an ongoing basis, thanks in part to an offer by Germany to hold a followup session next year in Berlin.

Former New York mayor Rudy Giuliani, who headed a large U.S. delegation that included Jewish leaders and members of Congress, said he was "delighted and heartened" by Germany's invitation.

"It would be a shame to take a historic conference like this and to turn it into a one-off event," he said. "And what could be more historic than organizing a first meeting in Austria and following it up in Berlin?"

The conference stemmed from a decision by the OSCE foreign ministers' meeting last year and will be followed by another meeting this fall on discrimination, racism and xenophobia.

The United States pushed for the meeting – at times in the face of reluctance by some European states, who insisted anti-Semitism should be addressed along with more general human rights and discrimination issues.

This remains the European Union's position. Its delegate repeated that "the EU stresses the importance of addressing racism, xenophobia, discrimination and anti-Semitism under a common, unified approach, using the experience and initiatives on the various issues to support action across the board."

The conference format left little room for debate on issues that were emotional and at times highly politicized.

Members of government delegations and non-governmental organizations gave brief statements on specific areas of concern: legal and institutional mechanisms to combat anti-Semitism; and the role of governments, civil society, the media and education.

History loomed large as speaker after speaker referred to the ghost of Hitler and the legacy of the Holocaust. Several Jewish delegates referred to how their own families were persecuted.

But present dangers – and future uncertainties – loomed even larger.

In effect, the conference became a forum to describe pernicious new mutations of what Giuliani termed "the Western world's oldest and most persistent species of hatred."

This included what many described as a new form of anti-Semitism that, while drawing on traditional anti-Jewish stereotypes, has increasingly shifted the target of hatred to Israel as the collective embodiment of the Jewish people.

This was linked partly to fallout from the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, and partly to an increasing identification of Jews and Israel with the United States in a confluence of anti-Semitism, anti-Zionism and anti-Americanism.

Speakers described a spike in violence against Jews and Jewish institutions in some countries since the start of the latest Palestinian intifadah, many of them attacks carried out by disaffected Muslim youth.

They also described a wave of hate mail and anti-Semitic Web sites, and a demonization of Israel in the media and the political arena.

This, speakers said, was accompanied by an erosion of post-Holocaust taboos that allows criticism, even legitimate, of Israel's actions against the Palestinian intifadah to legitimize traditional anti-Semitic expression.

Canadian MP and human rights lawyer Irwin Cotler described an "old-new escalating global and even lethal anti-Semitism carried on the new superhighway of the Internet."

The world has "seen the emergence of Israel as the collective Jew among nations," he said. "Traditional anti-Semitism rejects the right of Jews to exist in the Diaspora. The new anti-Semitism rejects the right of Israel and the Jewish people to live in the family of nations."

Part of this, he said, was an ideological anti-Semitism "that masks itself under the banner of anti-racism. In this form, Israel becomes 'racist' and Zionism is 'racism,' and Israel emerges as the enemy of all that is good and the embodiment of all that is evil."

Using this reasoning, he said, "the dismantling of Israel becomes held out as a moral imperative."

IMPORTANT NOTICE ABOUT GERMAN PENSIONS FOR WORK IN GHETTOS (ZRBG)

Did you live in a ghetto during World War II? Did you voluntarily work while you were living there? If so, you may be eligible for a German pension.

In June 2002, the German parliament passed a law deeming periods of voluntary work in a ghetto during World War II to be periods of contribution to the German pension system.

These periods can be used to qualify for a German old age or survivor's pension, which are known as "ghetto pensions". (Gesetz zur Zahlbarmachung von Renten aus Beschäftigungen in einem Ghetto, or ZRBG).

If you think you may be eligible for a pension and have not yet applied, please contact us. To qualify for retroactive payments to 1997, you must apply before June 30, 2003.

You should apply only if...

- ❑ you are 65 years of age or older;
- ❑ you lived in a ghetto in part of Central or Eastern Europe that was officially occupied or incorporated into the German Reich;
- ❑ you voluntarily worked; and
- ❑ you were compensated in some form for your work.

If you are the spouse of a person who is deceased, but who met the conditions described above, you may be eligible for a German survivor's pension and should apply as well.

AVIS IMPORTANT SUR LES PENSIONS ALLEMANDES POUR LE TRAVAIL DANS LES GHETTOS (ZRBG)

Avez-vous vécu dans un ghetto pendant la Deuxième Guerre mondiale? Y avez-vous travaillé volontairement? Si c'est le cas, vous pourriez être admissible à une pension allemande.

En juin 2002, le Parlement allemand a adopté une loi reconnaissant les périodes de travail bénévole dans les ghettos pendant la Deuxième Guerre mondiale comme des périodes de cotisation au régime de pensions allemand.

Vous pouvez utiliser ces périodes pour être admissible à une pension de vieillesse ou de survivant allemandes, aussi appelées pensions de ghetto (Gesetz zur Zahlbarmachung von Renten aus Beschäftigungen in einem Ghetto, ou ZRBG).

Si vous pensez être admissible à une pension et que vous n'en avez pas encore fait la demande, veuillez communiquer avec nous. Pour être admissible à des paiements rétroactifs jusqu'en 1997, vous devez présenter votre demande avant le 30 juin 2003.

Pour présenter une demande, vous devez :

- ❑ être âgé d'au moins 65 ans;
- ❑ avoir vécu dans un ghetto qui se trouvait dans un endroit de l'Europe centrale ou de l'Est qui était officiellement occupé par le Reich allemand ou qui y était intégré;
- ❑ avoir travaillé volontairement;
- ❑ avoir été compensé de quelque manière pour ce travail.

Si vous êtes le veuf ou la veuve d'une personne qui respectait ces critères, vous pourriez être admissible à une pension de survivant allemande et devriez en faire la demande.

Shakshuka delivers a tasty performance

By LINDSY GLADMAN
Special to The CJN

Entering the new Distillery Historic District in Toronto is like walking down a remote backstreet toward an underground club in a small Italian town in the middle of the last century.

In the district during last month's first Distillery Jazz Festival, I entered the Cointreau Cabaret of the 150-year-old Gooderham and Worts distillery for a performance by the band Shakshuka. Pillars blocked the view of the stage in many places and tables were pushed together so closely that people were obliged to move their chairs when another patron passed by.

The cold, unfinished feeling of the venue was quickly warmed by a heartfelt performance by a band with a strange and tasty name. Shakshuka, an Israeli dish made of eggs and vegetables, is the interestingly appropriate name given to this musical stir-fry of European and Middle Eastern culture.

Though off to a late start, the band quickly captured the audience's attention. Their first few songs were full of fresh energy and appeal. Using both modern and traditional instruments from different continents, the band blended early Jewish romance poems and mystic prayers with jazzy inflections.

The opening tune was a soothing Sephardi romance with Judeo-Spanish lyrics sung in a soaring voice by Aviva Chernick.

The band continued with peaceful prayers, adding a soulful element slightly reminiscent of synagogue choirs who reach the members of the congregation through poignant renditions of traditional prayers.

Popular songs like Shebachim Yerushalayim, the song for the protection of Jerusalem, elicited clapping from the mostly Jewish audience, while their rendition of Shalom Aleichem included an enchanting flute solo calling for the peace of the Sabbath to be brought both into Jewish homes and out into the world.

Shakshuka offers a funky orchestral sound using instruments such as the oud and flamenco guitar played by Aaron Lightstone and various Middle Eastern and Brazilian percussion devices played by Itay Keshet and Eldan Cohen. Some of these include the darabukka, an Egyptian hand drum widely used in Arabic, Sephardi and Mizrachi music, and the tablah, a small hand-held drum.

Other members of the band include Tamar Adams on vocals and percussion, Hartly Wynberg on bass, Angela Hammar on flute and Chris Mckhool on violin. The group has played as a trio and a quartet in different configurations in the past, and when asked if they will return to the stage as eight members together, Lightstone said: "We've worked too hard [as an octet] to stop at one gig."

The band's Sephardi roots are evident in both the Hebrew and the Arabic lyrics and the spirited sound that makes you want to get up and belly dance. Its members have been influenced by such groups as Habrera Hatuvit and Al Ol Ensemble.

Lightstone said he hopes Shakshuka will soon "break out into the world music scene." Keep your eyes and ears peeled for this jazz band.

FRINGE THEATRE FESTIVAL OFFERS 900 PERFORMANCES IN 12 DAYS

Fringe Theatre Festival: Toronto's Fringe Theatre Festival presents 125 plays from across Canada and around the world – more than 900 performances in more than 20 venues in the Annex and Fashion District neighbourhoods. July 2 to 13. Fringe Hotline, 416-966-1062. www.fringetoronto.com. Offerings include:

• Sixty with More Lies About My Weight, written and performed by Susan Freedman, is a comic look at families, diets, shopping, facelifts and forgetting. St. Vladimir's Theatre, 620 Spadina Ave., Venue 2.

• Zigazig ha!, a play by Dan Hershfield, focuses on a Jewish comic named Linus who tries to figure out his relationships with women, but can't decide whether he prefers fantasy, companionship or the thrill of the chase. Hershfield has thoroughly reworked the play since its first production at the McGill Drama Festival in 2000. St. Vladimir Theatre.

• Purpose, a philosophic comedy written and directed by Phil Pivnick and presented by Fourth Wall Productions, tells the story of two characters seeking out their creator as well as the answers to some of life's most important questions. Helen Gardiner Phelan Playhouse, 79A St. George St.

• Awe Theatre presents Sugar and Spice and Everything Nasty, a play for children, starring children, on the theme of bullies. Written by Janice Israeloff and directed by Michael Smith. Palmerston Library Theatre, 560 Palmerston Ave. (at Bloor). Adults $8, children $5. July 5 to 13 at various times. Fringe Hotline, 416-966-1062.

* * *

Klezmerists at Mezzetta: The Downtown Toronto Jazz Festival presents clarinetist Martin van de Ven and guitarist-pianist Brian Katz in concert. Just back from their fourth European tour, the dynamic duo perform selections from their CD Collected Stories, a melange of klezmer, Balkan, Israeli and jazz music. Mezzetta, 681 St. Clair Ave. W. June 26, 9 p.m. Katz is joined at Mezzetta on June 27 by Juno Award-winning jazz guitarist Rob Piltch; the guitar duo perform jazz standards and original compositions. Reservations for both shows, 416-658-5687.

* * *

Casting Call: Markham Little Theatre seeks non-Equity actors for a non-paying production of Roger Karshner's The Man with the Plastic Sandwich, to be directed by Mark Nathanielsz. Roles include Walter, a middle-aged, conservative man recently unemployed; Ellie, a 20-something, athletic, free-spirited woman; Haley, a 60-ish sophisticated former business executive; and Lenore, a mid-30s prostitute, jaded yet optimistic. Audition dates are July 3 and 6, with rehearsals to start July 10 for a September opening. 905-294-3338.

* * *

Synagogue Sounds: Pink Floyd, The Beach Boys, Crosby Stills Nash and Young and The Byrds are among the musical influences that affected the sound of Searching For My Voice, a CD by Allan Soberman containing a dozen liturgical selections from Adon Olam to Aytz Chaim.

The son of a cantor, Soberman brought a fresh sound to these familiar tunes by repeatedly overdubbing his voice to produce a choral effect. "I just kept on layering and layering and layering," says Soberman, whose CD is available at select Jewish stores and online at www.sobermanmusic.com. He performs a singles brunch at Adath Israel Synagogue on June 29.

Klezmer band raises funds for Argentine Jews

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

To support the plight of Argentine Jewry the Canadian Coalition for Argentinian Jewry hosted a concert featuring the South American duo Klezmer En Buenos Aires.

The coalition — a group of 13 synagogues and organization raising awareness to Argentina's economic depression — recently took over Toronto's Walter Hall with a blend of music, dedication and fund-raising requests.

"We organized this evening because we don't want to see this sadness continue," said Enrique Tabak, an Argentine Jew on the event's planning committee. "Too many Jewish schools and community centres have closed. Wages are one-quarter what they used to be. Now we have to help our brothers and sisters."

The program notes supported Tabak's dire picture. More than 50,000 Argentine Jews live below the poverty line. Around 70 per cent of Jewish-run businesses have closed. Seeing the need for immediate action, fundraising group Ve'ahavta is coordinating the money transfer (and arts evenings such as the klezmer concert). As of publication, Ve'ahavta has raised more than $10,000.

After two honours were bestowed in the first half-hour — to the late human-rights activist Renee Epelbaum and Temple Emanu El — the sold-out 500-seat hall erupted in delight as Klezmer En Buenos Aires took the stage, their only Canadian stop before heading to New York.

Klezmer En Buenos Aires, together for 22 years, displayed the unity of two expert musicians. On piano in the opening numbers, Cesar Lerner danced his fingers over the keys as ferociously as Marcelo Moguilevsky flew over flute holes.

Both musicians multi-tasked, since Lerner switched to accordion for some toe-tapping folk tunes, and his partner dabbled with clarinet, harmonica and "Jewish scatting" (how else to describe "ya-da-dy-dy-da-dy-dy"?)

Every klezmer concert should invoke emotion as well as energy, and the wide-smiling duo satisfied the crowd on both counts. The slower summery tunes were dipped in the melancholy Argentina is surely facing today; the quicker melodies punched notes into the air on time with Moguilevsky's foot stomps.

In several songs the crowd got the message and clapped a steady beat.

Lerner — garnering laughs for his physical comedy between tunes — moved to an African drum to play softly behind Moguilevsky's wooden flute lead. The upper-register notes gave off a rural feel, the joy of a simpler life behind staccato bursts.

The two musicians often traded glances, nodding sharply to dive into a new time signature, twitching the neck to signal a song's end. The improvisation sounded more seamless than some professional jazz outfits, and Klezmer En Buenos Aires never failed to enjoy their time on stage. They slapped their knees as percussion, clapped hands between piano chord strikes, and kibbitzed with the audience like the evening was an intimate gathering of close friends.

In fact, the evening was framed in that mood: friends asking friends to help other friends.

A rounded portrait of a jazzy Woody Allen

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

That Woody Allen's movies are suffused with appealing music is hardly coincidental.

Allen, a director, screenwriter and actor, is a devotee of New Orleans-style jazz and an accomplished clarinetist. For many years now, he and his band were a weekly fixture for 25 years at Michael's, a New York City pub, until it closed in 1996.

This facet of Allen's persona is caught by Academy Award-winning documentarian Barbara Kopple in her 1998 documentary Wild Man Blues, to be broadcast by TVOntario on Thursday, July 3, at 10 p.m.

In this revealing and entertaining film, which is nearly two hours long, Kopple follows Allen, his Korean-born wife, his sister and his entourage of musicians on a frenetic tour of Europe that takes them to Paris, Madrid, Geneva, Venice, Milan, Turin and London.

And while the jazz they thump out is quite alluring, the real attraction of Wild Man Blues is its rounded portrait of the normally camera-shy Allen.

What emerges from the film is that Allen is not completely confident about his musical abilities. But he and his band improve by the performance as they pump out a rhythmic blend of blues, ragtime and parade music.

Concert-goers appreciate their efforts. Yet, as Allen himself wonders, is he shamelessly trading on his fame as a filmmaker? That question is never quite answered.

Born Allan Stewart Konigsberg, Allen became obsessed by New Orleans jazz as a teenager. Describing its effect on him, he gushes, "It's like taking a bath in honey or something."

But as bouncy as the jazz may be, the high notes of the film are sounded when it focuses on Allen in a variety of modes.

He breakfasts with his much younger wife, Soon-Yi, who sensibly urges him to compliment his musicians on their last gig. He talks with his mother on the phone, and finds their conversation "gruelling." He rides a Venetian gondola, and it looks like a scene from one his own films. He poses for a swarm of paparazzi, whom he tolerates.

He mixes at a reception where awed fans approach him. He exercises on a treadmill, which he dismisses as a "disgusting invention."

He appears at a photo-op with an Italian mayor, but refuses a request from a fan to pose for a picture. He wades into a sea of well-wishers, but longs for his monastic writer's life.

Soon-Yi cuts him down to size when she acknowledges that she hasn't seen some of his most important movies. She adds that one of his lesser films, Interiors, is "long and tedious."

Back in New York after the exhausting tour, Allen chats with his parents.

Mischievously candid, his mother chides him for not having "completed tasks" as a youth, reminds him that he was "helped along" to stardom and admits that she would have preferred a Jewish daughter-in-law.

When discussing the Hebrew school he attended, Allen dismisses it as a "time-wasting" experience.

In the end, Allen comes across as self-absorbed, sardonic, remote and, horror of horrors, boring. He is clearly more than just famously neurotic.

Arts & Travel

Father's music is his son's muse

By JULIE TRAVES
Special to The CJN

Most fathers and sons bond at the ballpark or the movies. But Moshe and Mike Hammer spend their quality time onstage. On a Sunday evening recently, the father-son duo joined forces for a unique performance at the Glenn Gould Studio in Toronto.

The setting is spare, the lighting intimate. To one side stands the compact Moshe Hammer, holding his well-travelled violin. To his right is Mike, his 31-year-old son, at the ready in front of his workspace: a blank canvas and a table crammed with jars of paint and brushes.

At Moshe's first coaxing of Bach's Partita in E Major, Mike simply listens. A note. Two notes. A careful dab to the left. But soon the tune swells. Now the brush swirls: paint streaks above, below, across. Step in step with one another, father and son create a visual ballet on stage. In a crescendo of shape, colour and sound a new work of art is born before the eyes and ears of the audience.

As four paintings emerge from four pieces over the course of the evening, the audience murmurs with interest. The red canvas set out for Beethoven's moody Moonlight Sonata, for instance, elicits whispering between an elderly couple: "What does Beethoven have to do with red? It's a moonlight thing. I thought it would be purple, or gray, or blue."

First performed in Toronto with pianist Andrew Burashko and moving to Amsterdam in August, the idea for "Beethoven Meets Pollock" came to Mike in January while watching his father perform.

"I looked up at the stage and I could see myself painting there. The next day I asked him," Mike says.

It was an easy sell. A close family, the Hammers have always shared their art. When his children – Mike and his younger sister Maya – were babies, Moshe would let them stay up to hear him play with his chamber orchestra pals. The kids would also sit at the stairs and listen to their father teaching in the basement rec room.

Of course, Moshe's children didn't always appreciate what their dad did at the "office."

"Mike must have been 14 when for the first time he found out that I was quite good at what I was doing," Moshe says. "He mostly listened to rock and roll and he came to me and said, 'If you were in rock and roll we'd be rich!' So true."

Born in Hungary and raised in Israel, Moshe settled in Canada in 1970, first in Calgary and later in Toronto. Trained by world-renowned violinist Jascha Heifetz amongst others, Moshe performs all over North America, Europe and beyond. He splits his time between solo work, teaching and chamber music.

Mike turned to his own art in 1997, following studies in psychology and teaching at Queen's University. Though he focuses mainly on studio painting, Mike had painted live to music a number of times before he approached his dad.

Naturally, planning a show with his father was something altogether new. As Mike puts it: "There were a few times where we butted heads over ideas. But we always managed to work through those, talk through them. Eventually he would come around and see that I was right." He laughs, "I say this in jest."

Moshe also acknowledges that hanging the family shingle outside a concert hall creates special challenges.

"We are not the first father-son team to work together," he says, "but because we are both in the arts it was fascinating how discussions went and of course some father-son things came up. In the end, working with Mike for months on this has added more depth to our relationship. It will probably be one of the concerts that I'll remember on my deathbed. It had so much energy and love."

The Hammers' work succeeds not only at bridging two generations, but in closing the gulf between art and audiences of all ages. The effect of the Hammers' show is neatly paralleled by Moshe's comments on artistic collaboration:

"It's like a good dinner party. Something happens that evening, you come away feeling that something inside you has shifted or grown or you ate something more than just food."

Ex-major league pitcher would rather rock on

By HARVEY ROSEN
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — Former major league pitcher Scott David Radinsky has embarked on a most unusual post-baseball career.

The former White Sox, Dodger, Cardinal and Indians' reliever is today enjoying a lifestyle that an inordinate number of young people would literally crave. He is the lead singer of a well-known punk rock band, Pulley.

According to one sports Web site, "The L.A. Dodgers are one of a couple of teams that would like Radinsky to come out of retirement, but his loyalty to his bandmates in Pulley would not allow him to walk away from their current European tour which had been scheduled for months."

The 35-year-old native of Glendale, California would, of course, be in demand since left-handed relievers are in short supply these days. His last major league stint was a very brief one with Cleveland in 2001. At the time, he underwent Tommy John elbow surgery due to arm trouble. In addition, earlier in his career he suffered from Hodgkin's Disease.

Radinsky's punk rock career was well-known to Winnipeg Free Press music maven Bartley Kives. "Radinsky has sung with three California punk or punk-pop bands that rate their own footnotes in pop music history," explained Kives.

"In the 1980s, Scott's old band Scared Straight penned the skate-punk anthem Skate to Live. In the '90s he played with Ten Foot Pole, a popular punk-pop band before abruptly quitting and joining Pulley.

"Radinsky also founded a skate park called Skate Lab in his hometown of Simi Valley, California," continued Kives. "It's safe to say baseball is this guy's third love after skateboarding and punk rock."

Kives' final observation was substantiated by an article by Jon Regardie in the June 1999 issue of L.A. Magazine. Radinsky professes to detest baseball, except during the fleeting hours he actually plays.

"It's a world I do not feel comfortable in and have a hard time adapting to," notes Scott. "It's eight months of pretty much being by myself and dealing with the B.S. I hate."

The Jewish reliever was a late bloomer. He didn't start playing organized baseball until the 11th grade. He was drafted in 1986 by the White Sox and missed the entire 1994 season while being treated for the lymphoma.

In 1996, Scott located a group of friends who had played punk rock with him over the years, many of whom had also been kicked out of other bands. Together they formed Pulley.

Radinsky, indeed, had a fairly impressive record in his 11 major league seasons as a reliever. He appeared in 557 games, pitched 481.2 innings, struck out 358, won 42 games and lost 25, and had an ERA of 3.44.

Small wonder the door is still open for the 6-3, 215-lb. leftie should he yen to leap off the stage and into the bullpen once again.

POST PATTER:

• The Atlanta Braves have recalled pitcher Jason Marquis after optioning him to Richmond of the International League. The Jewish right-hander, whom the Braves had been counting upon, was sent down after issuing 10 walks in 14 innings and compiling an ERA of 6.57.

• Defensive lineman Noah Cantor has left the British Columbia Lions to play for the Toronto Argonauts for the upcoming CFL season.

• Adam Corrin, captain of the 2003 Manitoba champion St. John's Ravenscourt Eagles, was named the Winnipeg High School Hockey League's A division most valuable player.

• Former NHL tough guy Mike Hartman still can't get hockey out of his system. In mid-March, he signed with the Charlotte Checkers of the East Coast Hockey League. The 36-year-old played 397 games in the NHL and scored 43 goals along with 35 assists. Total penalty minutes of 1,388 defined the Jewish skater's career.

Blue Jays' Paul Godfrey sees similarities between Toronto, Israel

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

Toronto Blue Jays President and CEO Paul Godfrey believes there are similarities between the media's portrayal of daily life in Israel and how news outlets around the world see Toronto in the wake of SARS.

While Israelis carry on with their normal routines despite terror attacks, Torontonians remain cautious and on alert for the disease. Nevertheless, most residents are not under quarantine.

"I'm sure there are people who are frightened to go to Israel because they hear it's a place where there are a lot of bombings and a lot of lives lost of innocent people," said Godfrey. "There's a natural reluctance."

Likewise, he said, "there are a lot of people the further you go away from Toronto thinking there are people wearing masks in Toronto to protect themselves from SARS. There's a perception that maybe we're an old-fashioned leper colony here."

Paul Godfrey

As a former publisher of the Toronto Sun, Godfrey recognizes the power of the media and the tough job ahead getting people to gather in large crowds to watch the Jays, despite the fact they're an exciting team that went 21-8 in May, a franchise record for one month.

Already this season, the Blue Jays have lost thousands of potential tickets sales and inquiries into group packages have suffered a significant decline.

But Godfrey and the ball club have done their part to show the world Toronto is open for business, offering all unsold seats to fans for $1 a piece on April 29, packing SkyDome with more than 48,000 people. Four nights in which all upper deck and 200-level outfield tickets sold for $2 each also provided a significant boost to sagging attendance figures.

While Godfrey is doing what he can to help Toronto recover from the hit to tourism from SARS, he also plans to support Israel by visiting again in the near future.

"It's time for another trip," said Godfrey, who was named Canada's honorary chef de mission for the 2001 Maccabiah Games, but could not attend after the event was initially called off and then went ahead. "A number of people have encouraged me to go, and I intend to go in the next couple of years."

He's hopeful that they'll also give him a rain check for a future Maccabiah Games honour in 2005 or 2009.

B'nai Brith's 1998 Man of the Year remains very involved in various charitable endeavours, serving on the board of directors and the executive committee at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care and the board of governors at Mount Sinai Hospital.

He also launched the Herbie Fund, which helps bring terminally ill children to Toronto to receive medical treatment unavailable in their home country.

Three years ago, Godfrey established a foundation in his family's name to ensure continuation of a tradition of giving back to the community.

At the time, Godfrey had just left The Sun after 16 prosperous years. Later in 2000, he was named to his present position with the Blue Jays, an organization he helped bring to the city 24 years ago when he was chairman of Metropolitan Toronto.

The club is currently playing its best ball of his three-year tenure and contending for a championship may once again be a reality in the foreseeable future.

"I knew that things were headed in the right direction the minute we hired [general manager] J.P. Ricciardi," said Godfrey, referring to Ricciardi's hiring following the 2001 season. "J.P. has been just the right thing for the Blue Jays. We're already beginning to see the fruits of his labour."

Maccabi picnic a family fun day

Maccabi Canada is inviting current and past athletes, coaches and supporters to a family picnic day on Sunday, July 13, at Camp Robin Hood in Markham.

Designed as a fun experience for the entire family, festivities start at 10:30 a.m. and run until 4:30 p.m., rain or shine. Participants can enjoy all camp services, including the swimming pool, canoes and the climbing wall. Sports include basketball, beach volleyball, tennis, baseball and soccer.

For details, call Jay Bacher at 416-226-0035.

• Soul Searching, by Yaakov Astor, Feldheim, SC, $24.99.

The author, a respected scholar, discusses what he believes to be modern-day, scientific proof of the existence of an afterlife and the immortality of the human soul according to Jewish tradition.

• Real Jews, by Noah J. Efron, Basic Books, HC, $42.95.

This shocking discussion of secular versus haredi Jews in Israel is necessary reading for those interested in Israeli politics and society and the future of the Jewish state. According to this Bar-Ilan University professor, some of the anti-religious fervour and political advertising in Israel is no less violent than traditional European anti-Semitic hatred and propaganda.

• The Creation According to the Midrash Rabbah, by Wilfred Shuchat, Devora Publishing, HC, $39.95.

For the first time, the original Hebrew text of the Midrash Rabbah is presented with a solid English language translation and a new groundbreaking analysis and interpretation of this master biblical commentary in one definitive work.

YOUTH

• The Night Spies, by Kathy Kacer, Second Story Press, SC, $8.95.

This engaging, inspiring novel, based on true events, is the latest contribution by the award-winning Toronto author to the Holocaust Remembrance Series for Young Readers.

• Thirty-one Cakes, by Loren Hodes, Hachai Publishing, HC, $15.95.

A sweet story that demonstrates the importance of the mitzvah to return lost items to their owners. Beautiful illustrations by Harvey Klineman. Ages 3-8.

BAKED RATATOUILLE TERRINE

1 lg. eggplant, peeled & diced
coarse salt, optional
1 tblsp. extra virgin olive oil
1 lg. onion, sliced
4 cloves garlic, minced
1/2 cup shredded fresh basil
1/4 cup minced fresh parsley
1 tblsp. balsamic vinegar
1 lb. tomatoes, peeled, seeded, chopped
1 red & 1 yellow bell peppor, roasted & peeled
1/3 cup chopped olives
2 tsps. capers
3 med. zucchini, sliced paper thin
1 cup crumbled feta cheese
2 cups bread chunks, crusts removed

Heat oven to 425°F.; grease 8" high baking dish.
Heat olive oil. Sauté onion, garlic, basil & parsley about 7 mins. Add balsamic vinegar, turn heat to med.-high; stir 1 min. Add eggplant, tomatoes, bell peppers, olives, capers. Simmer, uncovered until mixture is very thick.
Line prepared dish with zucchini slices, covering bottom and sides, overlapping pieces so dish is entirely covered. Sprinkle feta cheese over zucchini on bottom. Spoon over vegetable mixture. Cover evenly with bread. Cover dish loosely with foil; bake 50 mins. removing foil 5 mins. before end of cooking time. Cool on rack for 10 mins. Invert serving plate and place it on top of dish. Holding both together, flip dishes to that dish is inverted on serving plate.Carefully lift dish. Serve at room temp. Yield: 8 servings.

Dear Karilani,

I am a high school senior, and I, like many of my peers, always assumed that I would be attending university in the fall. However, my grades did not meet the admissions standards, and I was denied acceptance. When I hear all my friends talk about what schools they got into I cannot help but feel left out. As well, I now have no plans for next year. What do you think I should do?

Confused Student

About Teens

Dear Confused Student,

I know that right now it feels as if you are the only one with this problem, but in reality many students do not get accepted into university the first year they apply.

When your friends begin to discuss university, try to change the subject or explain to them that you would feel more comfortable if they did not talk about it in front of you. It may seem as if it is all they want to talk about at the moment, but it is only because it is something new. Eventually they will tire of the topic and then you will not feel so left out.

As for your plans for next year, there are a number of options from which to choose. The first is to go back to high school for another year. This will give you an opportunity to upgrade some of your marks and give you a better chance of getting into university next year. Remember that acceptance is often based on extra-curricular activities and community involvement in addition to grades. So try to be active in your school.

Another option you have is to look into a co-operative education program. Many schools offer programs that let students work while earning high school credits. This will give you work experience, and it may help to give you an idea of what you want to do with your life.

You also have the choice of taking night or summer school courses and working during the day. This can help with the financial aspects of university when you do go.

Remember, it is important to keep everything in perspective. You have your entire life to go to university; going one year later will not make any difference in the long run.

Dear Karilani is written on a rotating basis by three high school students. The drawing is a composite. We welcome questions from our readers. Please mail, e-mail or fax them to The CJN.

Report calls for justice for Jews from Arab lands

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A report on the fate of Jewish communities in Arab lands may draw greater attention to an often ignored episode of Middle Eastern history at a time when the Palestinian refugee claims are under discussion.

That's the hope of one of the authors of a legal report that calls for redress for up to a million Jews and their descendants who were forced out of their homes by Arab governments.

Winnipeg lawyer David Matas believes the claims of Jewish refugees must be addressed as an issue of fundamental human rights. The claims of Palestinian refugees are high on the agenda in any discussion of Mideast peace, yet the experiences of Jews is currently given short shrift, Matas said.

"This is not just about the peace process," he said. "It's about getting justice."

Matas, along with Montreal native Stanley Urman, is author of Jews from Arab Countries: The Case for Rights and Redress. The report was prepared for Justice for Jews from Arab Countries (JJAC), an international organization that is lobbying for recognition of the rights of Jews who were displaced from their homes in Morocco, Algeria, Tunisia, Libya, Egypt, Syria, Lebanon, Iraq, Yemen and Aden in the 1940s and 1950s.

The CJN wins Rockower Award

LOS ANGELES — For the eighth consecutive year, The Canadian Jewish News (CJN) has won a Rockower Award for Excellence in Jewish Journalism.

At the annual conference of the American Jewish Press Association (AJPA) held here last week, The CJN received second place honours for excellence in editorial writing in 2002 among member newspapers whose circulation is more than 15,000.

The Rockower Awards were created in 1980 for the AJPA through an endowment by Philadelphia philanthropist I. Budd Rockower. Their purpose is to promote the development and improve the quality of Jewish journalism. The AJPA membership extends to publications, their staff, freelance contributors and other individual members across North America and in Israel. All are eligible to compete in the annual competition.

The Jewish Western Bulletin of Vancouver took home two awards for the category of newspapers whose circulation is less than 15,000, including a first place distinction for editorial writing.

The News in Brief

CANADA

B'nai Brith App'ts

TORONTO — As part of the expansion of its Montreal operations and the launch of its Canada-Israel Public Affairs Committee in Quebec (CIPAC-Q), that replaces the Canada-Israel Committee's defunct Quebec operations, B'nai Brith Canada said last week it appointed former federal Tory cabinet minister Gerry Weiner as CIPAC-Q's director of public affairs. It also named Bill Surkis, former executive director of the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre, as its Quebec regional director, and recent McGill University graduate and Hillel activist Yoni Petel as community outreach co-ordinator and campus support officer.

Thrift Shop Grant

TORONTO — UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Jewish Venture Philanthropy fund has awarded $100,000 to Jewish Family & Child Service to expand its Just a Second Shop. The money will support management training and facility improvement at the second-hand clothing store.

ISRAEL

Assimilation Conference

RAMAT GAN — Rabbis, scholars and leaders of the major streams of Judaism met at Bar-Ilan University last week for a two-day conference on fighting assimilation titled "Rabbis and the Challenge of Assimilation: Historical and Contemporary Approaches." Bar-Ilan's Rappaport Center for Assimilation Research hosted the second annual event.

Fundraising in Libya

SAN FRANCISCO — Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat has reportedly raised $2.5 million (US) from Libyan leader Muammar Gadhafi for suicide bombings. The money will fund terror attacks by the Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigade, the San Francisco Chronicle has reported.

Immigration Drops

JERUSALEM — Immigration to Israel is in a "tailspin," Immigrant Absorption Minister Tzipi Livni said last week. Livni said her ministry must examine potential immigrants' attitudes to make Israel appear more appealing to them. Nearly 7,700 immigrants arrived in the first five months of 2003, heralding a dramatic drop from the 35,000 who arrived in 2002. Ongoing violence, a poor economy and cuts in immigrant subsidies are blamed for the decrease.

WORLD

New Award Unveiled

NEW YORK — The family of philanthropist Charles Bronfman has unveiled a new $100,000 (US) prize for "emerging" Jewish leaders. The award, created and funded by Bronfman's children to honour his 70th birthday, will go to an individual or group under 50 that has made a mark on Jewish life. Details are available at www.thecharlesbronfmanprize.com. Nominations close Oct. 31.

Insurance Law

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The U.S. Supreme Court has struck down a law requiring California insurance firms to disclose their Holocaust-era policies. The court ruled 5-4 that the Holocaust Victims Insurance Relief Act, passed in California in 1999, interfered with the president's conduct of foreign policy. The law bars European insurers and their U.S. affiliates from doing business in the state if they refuse to publish a full list of all policy holders between 1920 and 1945. The law was passed to make it easier for Jewish descendants of Holocaust victims to obtain payments.

Skinheads Charged

BERLIN — Three members of a German skinhead rock band were charged last week with forming a criminal organization that promulgated hate through their songs. A German prosecutor said they were trying to foment "Aryan revolution." The title song of one album called for bombing Israel. The men, arrested in a 2001 anti-Nazi crackdown, face up to five years in jail.

Jewish Leader Sues

BERLIN — A German Jewish leader being probed for possible involvement in drugs and prostitution sued the Berlin Justice Department over allegedly illegal searches of his home and office. Michel Friedman's lawyer said prosecutors carried out a "public hanging" by leaking details of the case.

CJC Honours Controversial Kazakh President

OTTAWA — Canadian Jewish Congress honoured the president of Kazakhstan last week with a dinner on Parliament Hill for promoting harmony between his Asian republic's small Jewish minority and its Muslim majority, but Ottawa played down his visit because of his human rights record.

Nusultan Nazarbayev, whose rights record has been criticized by the U.S. State Department and Amnesty International, was to meet privately with Prime Minister Jean Chrétien and Foreign Affairs Minister Bill Graham in Ottawa, but there were to be no formal public events because it was not a state visit, Chrétien's office told the Ottawa Citizen.

The CJC dinner was to be attended by ambassadors from Muslim countries, as well as the deputy head of mission from the Israeli embassy (since Ambassador Haim Divon is on an Ottawa-sponsored tour of the arctic), CJC executive vice-president Jack Silverstone said.

At this point in Mideast affairs, it's important to recognize Nazarbayev's "efforts to foster religious understanding," Silverstone told the Citizen, adding Nazarbayev's work has been praised by the Pope and Muslim leaders.

Alex Neve, head of Amnesty Canada, told the Globe and Mail he hoped CJC officials would raise human rights issues in talks with Nazarbayev, who has been in power since 1991.

'Right of return' conference denounces Israel, PA

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

A "right of return" conference held at the University of Toronto late last month called for a one-state solution to the Arab-Israeli conflict, attacked the international peace plan known as the road map, denounced the Palestinian Authority and branded Israel as an "illegitimate" state.

Calls for one-state solution

The conference was sponsored by the Palestine Right to Return Coalition, referred to in Arabic as Al-Awda, and was hosted by the University of Toronto Arab Student Association.

Among the scheduled panelists listed on the conference's Web site were pro-Palestinian activist and Concordia University student Samer Elatrash, anti-globalization protester Jaggi Singh and John Clarke of the Ontario Coalition Against Poverty. One of the keynote speakers was Dr. Salman Abu-Sitta, a London, England-based former member of the Palestine National Council.

Toronto city councillor Olivia Chow was scheduled to be at the Al-Awda Awards Dinner on Saturday night and give a talk there, but "she was sick" and did not attend, said her assistant Matthew Lee.

Al-Awda describes itself as a broad-based, non-partisan, global democratic association of grassroots activists lobbying for the inalienable right of Palestinian refugees to return to their former homes in what is now Israel.

Rejecting a two-state solution, the premise of current diplomacy to resolve Israel's dispute with the Palestinians, Al-Awda claims that the legal basis of the right of return is enshrined in two documents: United Nations resolution 194, passed Dec. 11, 1948, and article 13 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

At the close of the conference, billed as Al-Awda's first annual convention, a delegate predicted that Israelis will be forced "to budge," to accept a one-state solution some day.

According to Al-Awda, the first Arab-Israeli war created almost 800,000 Palestinian refugees.

Al-Awda says that more than 3.7 million such refugees are registered with the United Nations and that about 2 million unregistered refugees live in countries and regions "within a very short distance of their original homes and lands."

Another delegate described Israel, rather than Israelis, as "the enemy." He implied that Israeli Jews would be permitted to live in a Palestinian state that supplanted Israel.

Al-Awda's Web site (www.al-awda.org) claims that Israelis would not have to be displaced for the right of return to be implemented.

"A study of the demography of Israel shows that 78 per cent of Israelis are living in 14 per cent of Israel and that the remaining 86 per cent of the land in Israel is mostly land that belongs to the refugees."

Delegates passed a resolution rejecting the road map, saying it suppresses the human and national rights of the Palestinians and tries to end the intifadah.

Excoriating the Palestinian Authority, led by President Yasser Arafat and Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas, one delegate declared, "We don't recognize the self-elected and self-proclaimed Palestinian leadership."

Another delegate charged that the PA "compromises" Palestinian rights.

The delegates, most of whom were Arabs and appeared to be in their 20s and 30s, defined Israel as a "racist," "apartheid," "squatter" and "illegitimate" state without any right to exist.

They concurred that the phrase "Zionist colonization," rather than the word "occupation," should be used to describe Israel's presence in the Middle East.

"Occupation," a delegate argued, implies recognition of Israel.

Delegates agreed that the phrase "Palestine/Israel," which peace activists in Canada and the United States often use, is unacceptable because of its implicit recognition of Israel.

Stratford's Ottawa sisters

On May 8 in this space, I wrote about the positive impact the parents of Susan Schulman, the director of The King and I at this year's Stratford Festival, had on the artistic path she would eventually follow.

There are more such stories about Stratford artists to be told.

Lynn and Robert Gould moved from Montreal to Ottawa early in their young married and professional lives, with a young toddler, Jennifer, in tow. In Ottawa, they eventually had two more children, Adrienne and Jonathan, all born four years apart and during the same week of the year as Jennifer.

From the editor's desk

Lynn is an interior decorator with an "extremely artistic flair," as daughter Adrienne told The CJN. Robert is a lawyer by vocation, but a singer and a thespian by avocation who always performed magic tricks around his children, often recruiting them to serve as his assistants for his neighbourhood magic shows.

The Goulds' home, merely metres from their shul, Machzikei Hadas, was a veritable greenhouse of song and dance in which their three young flowers eventually blossomed full of self-confident colour and artistry.

Indeed, all three Gould children chose lives in theatre. Jennifer and Adrienne are integral members of the acting cast at Stratford Festival of Canada. Jonathan is presently plying his profession in New York.

The CJN recently spoke with the two Gould sisters who, for the first time in their professional careers, are in the same production, Lerner and Loewe's Gigi.

Jennifer plays the title role of Gigi as well as that of unlucky, forlorn La Esmeralda in The Hunchback of Notre Dame. Both roles are demanding. She performs seven shows a week this season, her fifth at Stratford. But she takes it all in energetic stride. She loves her work and her life in all its multifaceted, fulfilling individual and familial dimensions.

Jennifer's family ties are very close. She immediately conveys to the inquiring writer the sense of gratitude she feels to her parents. When she was 10 years old, she told The CJN, she and her father auditioned and both won roles with the Orpheus Operatic Society in Ottawa in its production of Music Man.

That was the initial taste of theatre that Jennifer would imbibe ever after. After she obtained a degree in fine arts from York University, she apprenticed at Stratford, where she has performed in a number of productions, including Much Ado About Nothing, Filumena, Camelot, The Taming of the Shrew and Amadeus.

Adrienne is in her fourth season at Stratford. She studied fine arts in North Carolina and spent about a year in New York before finding her way to Stratford at the invitation of the late Al Waxman, who cast her in the role of Margot in The Diary of Anne Frank. Her credits at Stratford, which include roles in The Merchant of Venice, A Midsummer Night's Dream and Tempest-Tost, are similarly impressive.

The sisters delight in each other's achievements and rightfully so because they are both very talented.

Jennifer is very strong in the role of Gigi. She executes with elegance and charm the transformation of the young teenager from innocent, churlish waif to more experienced, maturing debutante. Her "porcelain beauty," as described by one writer, is highlighted to the great advantage of the production. The spotlight illuminates her enchanting presence on stage. Her singing is robust and her exchanges with other characters flow lightly, smoothly.

Adrienne's role in the production is a less dominant one but more acrobatic: that of a dancer and of Madame Laverne. But her presence on stage is at times electric, especially in the last large ensemble dance scene where at one point, she stands on one leg, effectively doing a fully vertical splits, the other leg tagging the shoulder of her dance partner. Of her younger sister's abilities, Jennifer proudly notes that Adrienne has always been "very gumby-ish" and athletic.

There are difficulties, of course, with the story of Gigi. It is a tale about a young courtesan. It does not hold up well today. Indeed, we suspend our moral framework to focus on and appreciate the sheer spectacle and theatre of the tale.

That spectacle is a colourful romp of exquisite costume, choreography and song. The five key roles of Gigi, Gaston, Honoré, Mamita and Alicia are performed with great confidence and clarity. The interplay between the sisters Mamita and Alicia is a delight. Patricia Collins as Aunt Alicia is superb, perfectly exaggerating the aristocratic character to fit the role of Gigi's great-aunt's wise and wizened mentor.

The beautiful flowers that grew from the seeds Lynn and Robert Gould planted some three decades ago are on display at the Stratford Festival. It is a garden from which all of us can learn as parents and take delight as reviewers.

Adrienne and Jennifer Gould

Change is difficult to undertake and difficult to write about. Beginning in July, Gil Troy will write in the monthly space that Morton Weinfeld has occupied so sagely for these past eight years. We owe Prof. Weinfeld a great debt for contributing so ably to The CJN.

Film analyzes breakdown of Oslo peace process

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Review

The Oslo peace process, which lasted from 1993 to 2001, is the subject of Relentless: The Struggle for Peace in Israel, a chilling but factually incomplete documentary.

Relentless had its Canadian premiere at the Bloor Cinema recently. It was produced by HonestReporting.com, which describes itself as a "Web site dedicated to ensuring that Israel receives fair media coverage."

The issues the film raises are timely, given Israel's current talks with the Palestinians over the road map, the U.S-sponsored peace plan.

The one-hour movie, directed by Wayne Kopping and Brian Spector, offers a fleeting overview of the Arab-Israeli conflict from 1947 – the year the United Nations presented, and the Arab world rejected, the Palestine partition scheme – to the present.

In the main, however, this visually strong film concentrates on the breakdown of the Oslo talks, a diplomatic framework that aimed to give Israel and the Palestinians a creative way out of the cycle of bloodshed and despair.

Like Henry Kissinger's diplomacy in the post-Yom Kippur War era, Oslo was a step-by-step process designed to build mutual confidence and trust through interim accords.

A two-state solution was not Oslo's explicit objective, but everyone understood this would be the final outcome if talks succeeded.

Once the thorny issues, from permanent borders to Palestinian refugees, were settled, Israel and the new Palestinian Authority would supposedly coexist in harmony.

Of course, this grand bargain depended on the degree to which both sides honoured their commitments. The Palestinians were expected to disown, denounce and crack down on violence and terrorism, stop incitement and internalize their formal acceptance of Israel.

Israel, primarily, was expected to make a series of mutually agreed upon withdrawals from the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, populated mainly by Palestinian Arabs, but also by Jews living in settlements.

Relentless claims that while Israel basically lived up to its obligations, the Palestinians essentially violated them.

True enough. The Palestinians broke many of their solemn promises. No sooner had the 1993 Declaration of Principles been signed and sealed than Palestinian gunmen opposed to peace began killing Israeli civilians and soldiers. And from 1994 onward, Hamas and Islamic Jihad resorted to suicide bombings to undermine Oslo. Rarely did the PA rein in the terror.

In addition, the Palestinian media demonized Israel and Jews, while Palestinian schools and mosques poisoned untold minds.

And as Relentless shows conclusively, PA President Yasser Arafat played a disingenuous role in mobilizing Palestinian masses against the idea of real peace while earnestly proclaiming his desire for peace.

The film acknowledges Israel was "not perfect" in complying with Oslo, citing as an example the building and expansion of settlements. But this important aspect of Israeli policy – which the United States, Canada and others have consistently described as unilateralism and thus an obstacle to peace – is only glossed over.

According to Relentless, Israel ceded all lands required of it, but in fact, Israel did not carry out the third withdrawal. And when Israeli spokesperson Raanan Gissin says that Israel ceded 42 per cent of the West Bank to the PA, he neglects to mention that the PA gained full control of only 18 per cent of the territory.

For some reason, Benjamin Netanyahu, Israel's prime minister during a pivotal phase of the Oslo experiment (1996-1999), is left out of the picture. Is this a glaring oversight or a deliberate omission? Whatever the case, this yawning gap damages the film's credibility.

Relentless claims the PA did not amend its national covenant. In actuality, the PA revised the covenant, not once but twice.

The film asks rhetorically: What do the Palestinians want? The answer: Israel's elimination.

This is an over-simplification. Some Palestinians do seek Israel's destruction. But what about pragmatic Palestinians, such as Mahmoud Abbas and Sari Nusseibeh, who are working tirelessly for peace? Are we to think Prime Minister Ariel Sharon is knowingly, though naively, negotiating with Palestinians who reject a two-state solution?

Hate charges laid for CDs

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Toronto police have laid hate-promotion charges after seizing a large number of compact discs from a 21-year old who was selling them at a concert in January.

Police attended a concert in Etobicoke on Jan. 11 at which several "white supremacist skinhead bands" performed, police said in a statement. At the conclusion of the show, police seized the CDs, which contained music by "hate rock" groups.

Charged is Mark Roy of Toronto, who faces 15 counts of wilfully promoting hatred. Roy is scheduled to appear in court July 16.

Canadian Jewish Congress applauded the police service's hate crimes unit for its diligence in monitoring the hate performances.

"The hate crimes unit has shown us that hate laws in this country are being used and every effort is made to ensure that hate material will not be distributed," said Frank Bialystok, chair of community relations for CJC's' Ontario region.

Det. James Hogan of the hate crimes unit declined to comment on the case or provide additional details.

Breaking the lose-gain cycle

At Positive Changes Hypnosis Centres people lose weight for good

It's all in the mind
In an altered state such as hypnosis it's easy to incorporate new, healthier habits

Did you ever stop and wonder how thin people stay that way? If you're overweight, you may have thought these slim folk were blessed with a superior metabolism. The truth is, most naturally slim people stay that way without a struggle because they have developed habits subconsciously that keep them from gaining weight. The good news is that anyone can think and eat like a thin person just by programming their subconscious mind.

Hypnosis works because it helps people change habits. Overweight people know the right things to do, like drinking more water or leaving food on their plate. They just don't know how to make these behaviours a habit. In an altered state like hypnosis, it's easier to incorporate new habits. Habitual behaviour comes from the subconscious mind; that's why it's so difficult for some people to change a habit. By using hypnosis to bypass the subconscious mind, we're able to start laying the foundation for new habits in the subconscious.

Besides weight loss, Positive Changes helps many clients quit smoking, reduce stress or change virtually any destructive habit. There are ancillary benefits to hypnosis too. Studies show that it can also lower blood pressure, improve memory and help people learn to relax.

Why wait another minute? You have the opportunity NOW to not only lose weight but KEEP IT OFF — without diets, drugs or gimmicks. Call today for a free consultation!

Liberal MPP votes with Tories to pass tax credit

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Liberal MPP Monte Kwinter voted with the government last week as the Ontario legislature passed the bill entrenching the private school tax credit in law.

Bill 53 passed by a vote of 51-36. Kwinter (York Centre), who had been criticized for voting against the measure when it passed first reading last month, was the only Liberal or NDP MPP to support the bill.

His vote earned him a standing ovation from the Tories in the legislature last Wednesday.

A vocal supporter of tax relief for faith-based schools but not other private schools, Kwinter voted against his own party, whose leader, Dalton McGuinty, has promised to kill the credit should the Liberals form the next government.

Monte Kwinter

"First readings are procedural and [voting along party lines] is automatic," Kwinter told The CJN. "I have always had concerns about how the government has handled this. I don't support funding of elite or private schools that have no standards or don't disclose them, but I've always supported [relief] for faith-based schools."

Kwinter said he voted against Bill 53 on first reading "because I don't want [the government] to think I buy into everything they've done." He said he voted with the Tory government to pass the bill because "I felt I had to be counted in the end."

Asked how he reconciles his views with his leader's pledge to repeal the credit, Kwinter said, "Well, first, we have to win the election. After that, it will be important to have someone at the table to present the other side."

The bill places the Equity in Education Tax Credit back on its original schedule.

When introduced in the 2001-2002 budget by former finance minister Jim Flaherty, the measure – a milestone in the Jewish community's fight for government funding of Jewish day schools – entitled parents of children in private and faith-based schools to a tax credit of up to $700 per child, or 10 per cent of the first $7,000 of tuition fees. The credit was to rise 10 per cent per year, and be worth up to $3,500 per child annually by 2006.

A year ago, Premier Ernie Eves announced the province could not afford that and froze the credit at 10 per cent for two years. But in March, he reversed the freeze, meaning the credit, as intended, will be worth 20 per cent of tuition for 2003. Bill 53 entrenches the move in law and fully implements the credit's rise through to its maturity.

"We're very pleased Monte Kwinter saw the justice in the tax credit," said Yisroel Janowski, founding president of the Ontario Association of Jewish Day Schools, who was in the legislature to witness the vote.

"It's unfortunate that others in the Liberal party didn't come to a similar realization."

CD-ROM looks at Islamic extremists

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Radical Islamic groups are turning to the Internet to raise money, recruit suicide-bombers, send encoded messages and offer hate-motivated games to children.

Extremist groups such as Al Qaeda are using the Internet in a very sophisticated manner, said Rabbi Abraham Cooper, associate dean of the Los Angeles-based Simon Wiesenthal Center.

In fact, they are making "far more sophisticated use of the Internet than white supremacists. They're head and shoulders above that," he said.

Rabbi Cooper was in Toronto and Ottawa recently to launch the latest version of the centre's annual CD-ROM compilation of hate groups. This year's CD-ROM, Digital Hate and Terrorism 2003, focuses heavily on the efforts of Islamic radicals to market their cause to a wider public, he said.

More than 4,000 problematic sites were examined by centre researchers and that number was pared down to a more manageable sampling of 200 Web sites on the CD. One group, Jihad for Muslims, infiltrated Yahoo clubs to get Web access, Rabbi Cooper said, adding that what's particularly troubling is the site sponsors were probably aware they would be quickly shut down by the Web host. (Yahoo removed them after one day.) It appears they used the site to spread secret messages to supporters through the use of steganography, embedding secret codes in the text.

Another Islamic group advocates creation of a universal Islamic caliphate, but the group goes beyond simple rhetoric. "It went so far as to make death threats against 10 prominent Jews in Denmark," Rabbi Cooper said.

The CD-ROM also lists a Web site that extols Al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden and the 19 suicide bombers who attacked New York and Washington. The site also provides children with video games that start with prayers and move on to an animation of the interior of a jetliner crashing into the World Trade Center towers.

Yet another Web site, attributed to the Palestinian Information Centre, features an eagle pulling flesh from a human skull: "We will use the skulls of Zion's sons to build a bridge to Heaven," the site reads.

"This call for suicide bombers, issued by the terrorist Hamas organization, was made not from its base in Gaza but by supporters in Sweden," the CD-ROM notes.

White supremacists continue to use the Internet as well, focusing on "leaderless resistance" to mainstream society, but they have also put out feelers to join forces with radical Muslims in a limited way. Though the two sides do not share operational links, they subscribe to the maxim that "my enemy's enemy is my friend," with the result that the racist National Alliance has held demonstrations at the Israeli embassy in Washington in support of the Palestinian "right of return." During Ramadan, David Duke, the former Klansman, was an honoured guest in Bahrain where he spoke on the U.S. responsibility for the 9/11 attacks, Rabbi Cooper said.

Canadian law enforcement and intelligence units deserve "high grades" for their monitoring of terrorism and hatemongers, but Rabbi Cooper said he questioned whether the legislative branch – which was slow to ban Hezbollah as a terrorist organization – fully understands the danger.

"I'm not sure a lot of Canadians get it, and see a clear and present danger to our society and our values," he said.

Only wariness

A majority of Israelis support their government's willingness to test Mahmoud Abbas' bona fides and that of the Palestinian Authority's (PA) in their professed intention to police their own people. The decision to withdraw IDF forces from Gaza and imminently from Bethlehem is part of that test.

But though there is support by the majority for their government's decision, there is certainly no accompanying sense of optimism. There is, rather, profound wariness. Israelis bear no illusions when it comes to the true intentions of Hamas and their kindred fellows.

For his part, Abbas is trumpeting as a great achievement the three-month "ceasefire" against attacks on Israelis he arranged with the radical Palestinian Islamists. He is obviously hoping that it will displace the need to "dismantle the terror infrastructure" as he promised he would.

Not to be left behind in the dust of these rolling developments, Yasser Arafat proclaimed a six-month ceasefire of all Fatah actions against Israelis. In so doing, of course, he proved yet again the naked hypocrisy of every peace nostrum he has uttered in the past and the brazen fraudulence of every denial of responsibility for violence against Israelis that emanated from Fatah or its related thugs. (Indeed, we note that the Fatah-created Al Aksa Martyrs Brigade was not included in the ceasefire declaration.)

Israelis will soon know if Abbas and the PA are truly intent on finding an accommodation with them. The test will be in Abbas' efforts to eliminate terror– not in his pronouncements.

Did we fail our friends?

It is a poignant cri de coeur. In the essay on the following page, Martin Lockshin and Rachael Turkienicz eloquently plead with us to "consider the ethical aspects of the [SARS] tragedy and to think about them in a Jewish way." Underpinning their plea was the way some of us may have behaved towards friends and neighbours who were unfortunately caught up in the SARS quarantines. Trapped and immobilized by our own fears, did we fail them? In some cases, alas, we did.

We may have added to their sense of isolation rather than help to dissipate it. We may have extended their feeling of woe rather than diminish it.

Our friends and neighbours are our community. And our sages have always taught that "he who shares in the community's trouble will also share in its consolation."

But by failing our friends, we failed our community. We did not share in the trouble that was theirs, but never theirs alone. In truth, it was ours as well, although some of us did not see that.

Quarantine should never have been ostracism. Where it was, it was wrong. We must all reflect upon and learn from our own behaviours.

Understanding Tikkun Olam

In his column "Frank Ekstein: a godly atheist," Avrum Rosensweig writes that any Jewish atheist who aids his fellow man is practising tikkun olam (CJN, June 5). Like other progressive Jews, Rosensweig believes tikkun olam is a major tenet of Judaism.

However, if you open a siddur to the second paragraph of the Aleinu prayer, where the concept of tikkun olam is defined, you will find that the paragraph, but for four Hebrew words, is a prayer for the kingdom of God, and even those few words speak of the injunction "to mend the world under the Almighty's sovereignty." Without God at its centre, it is not tikkun olam but secular humanism.

The first principle in Judaism is belief in God. The Torah commences, "In the beginning, God created…," or as commentators interpret it, the beginning of wisdom is belief in God as the Creator. The Torah ends with the word "Israel," whose last syllable means God.

Many Jews who embrace tikkun olam are hostile to traditional Jewish values. Last year, one of the men in a prominent Jewish same-sex union, claimed that when the Reform movement sanctioned such relationships, it performed an act of tikkun olam. Similarly, many secular Jews who show solidarity with the Palestinians but are heartless to the Israeli victims of evil Palestinian suicide bombers, latch on to only one "mitzvah" – tikkun olam.

Tuition fees unavoidable

I recently read the response by Sheldon Carr, president of Associated Hebrew Schools, to the concerns of many Associated parents ("Associated responds to fee increase," CJN, Letters to the Editor, June 5). Unfortunately, Carr just does not get it. Parents can no longer afford exorbitant tuition fees. Insults and old clichés will not make the situation any better.

The philosophy "that no Jewish child should be denied a day school education for financial reasons" is constantly repeated. If this is the case, why is tuition set beyond the reach of the average family? Subsidies are offered, but only for parents willing to beg for funds. Parents are told to make sacrifices and forgo holiday trips, summer camp, RRSP contributions and parties, yet such expenses are deemed acceptable for parents who are prepared to bare their souls to tuition committees. Parents who refuse this humiliation are referred to as "uncommitted Jews."

Carr mentions that UJA Federation funding has been frozen for more than a decade, placing the burden on parents who pay full fees. Why has he waited until now to advise parents of this shortfall?

Most of the $800,000 in "budget cuts" are a direct result of reduced enrolment and pre-planned reductions. What about the new programs that were introduced at a cost of $3.7 million (over $2,000 per student)? How much do existing programs cost? How many students attend each program? What is the cost per student?

Tuition fees have increased $1,800 over a five-year period, an increase of approximately 25 per cent. Whose income has gone up 10 per cent, let alone 25 per cent in the past five years?

It is nice that Associated is the envy of many other communities, but at what cost? Parents cannot afford to pay for programs that benefit small segments of the population. They cannot afford to subsidize programs they are not using. They cannot afford to educate other parents' children. Parents have been trying to tell this to school administrations for years, as evidenced by the reduced enrolments. Ignoring these warning signs has resulted in the loss of thousands of students from the day school system. How much longer must this continue?

Questions for Emmanuel Anati

Your recent articles about Mount Sinai highlight the need for every Jew to know ancient as well as modern Jewish history ("Locating Mount Sinai," CJN, June 5 and 12).

Unfortunately, Emmanuel Anati is barking up the wrong mountain. Deuteronomy (2:1) tells us that Mount Sinai is an 11-day journey from Kadesh Barnea. At a rate of 20 to 30 miles per day (average rate on foot in the desert), the two locations are 200 to 300 miles apart.

The location of Kadesh Barnea is well-known and not disputed – the central Negev. Har Karkom is also in the central Negev, only a short distance away.

Anati's work is facinating and reveals the pre-history of the Negev, 1,000 years before the Israelites arrived, but tells us nothing about Mount Sinai.

Joe Greenbaum
Hamilton, Ont.

Emmanuel Anati responds

The question asked by Joe Greenbaum has a precise explanation on pages 52 and 53 of the book The Riddle of Mount Sinai. A map is included! The 11-day journey from Kadesh Barnea to Mount Sinai by the way of Mount Seir has been surveyed in the field. In the Bible, there are several good hints about the location of Mount Sinai. All of them are discussed in the book.

SARS, quarantine and Jewish ethics

By MARTIN LOCKSHIN and RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

Toronto is still reeling from the recent outbreak of SARS. The Jewish community has not been spared. While the names of SARS victims are not being released, the latest official statistics (the day this article was written) showed 35 deaths from SARS in Toronto. We personally know of five Jews who have died from SARS, and there may have been more. In a city whose population is less than four per cent Jewish, at least 14 per cent of the fatalities have been Jews. No wonder the Jewish community feels so affected by this tragic problem.

Like everyone else, when Jews in Toronto talk about SARS, they talk about their fears and their trust or lack of trust in the medical and public health systems, as well as the sadness and uncertainty engendered by a surprising epidemic such as this in the 21st century. Some Jews actually discuss the theological significance of SARS. Sadly, though, we have heard very few Jews in Toronto discussing the ethical issues. This is a plea to our community to consider the ethical aspects of the tragedy, and to think about them in a Jewish way.

In the last few weeks, both of us have attended the funeral of more than one SARS victim. One of our families (Rachael's) has undergone tremendous challenges over the last month as a result of SARS. Several family members became infected with the disease after visiting a local hospital. Others were quarantined as a precautionary measure to ensure they had not also been infected. Thank God, the immediate family are now all healthy and SARS-free, but some were critically ill, and some extended family members were, tragically, lost forever.

By and large, the support from the Jewish community, both in Toronto and internationally, was overwhelming and tremendously comforting. Many people expressed concern through letters, cards and e-mails, while others called. Food was delivered to quarantined homes, some accompanied by cards and some anonymously. Toys were also delivered so that quarantined children could escape their thoughts for a few hours when they were unable to leave the house. People were praying, wishing the quarantined and the ill well, sending positive thoughts and offering, again and again, to help. In short, over the last few weeks, the family saw some of the most moving and caring behaviour possible. They are overwhelmed and touched that people could be – and were – so kind. Their behaviour was exemplary.

And yet, as with most things in life, there is another, less pleasant side to the story. While many people were eager to reach out, others shied away when time came for personal interaction. One relative, a small boy who was never in quarantine, developed an ear infection and his parents could not find a doctor who would agree to treat him. One cousin who never became sick and whose precautionary quarantine had been over for some time sat shivah for her father without a single visitor. Some of the children in the family were verbally accosted by strangers who grilled them to learn the details of their losses.

In several cases, quarantines were unofficially "extended." People who had never been ill but had been in precautionary quarantine were asked to stay home from work or to keep their children out of school, perhaps indefinitely, beyond the period determined by the health authorities.

We hope this article will stimulate a discussion about how people should behave toward their friends and neighbours after quarantine.

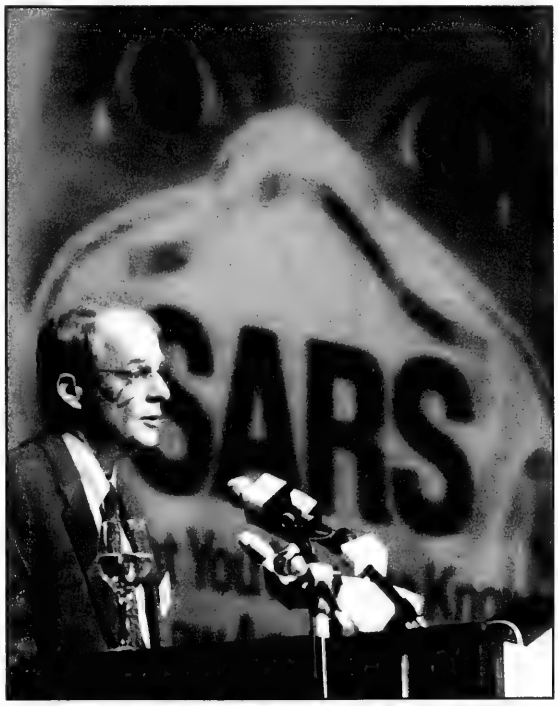
What does Judaism teach us about risk management? Rabbinic tradition teaches us that one of the most important mitzvot is the biblical requirement "venishmartem me'od lenafshotechem," of taking care of our bodies, which were entrusted to us from God, and refraining from doing anything to endanger our health. From that point of view, we can understand that there might be, in theory, Jewish grounds for taking an extremely cautious approach to SARS and going far beyond the requirements of the public health authorities.

Is there anything unethical about the decision of frightened Torontonians to stay away from Blue Jays' games, to avoid movies and theatre, to refrain from riding the bus and to keep their children away from those venues as precautions to ensure they don't contract SARS? Probably not. Does Jewish law require or recommend such behaviour? Hardly. People who wish to be especially fearful and cautious are not contravening Jewish law, but they are also not behaving in an exemplary manner. Jews are required to fear God, fear our parents and fear sin, but not to fear death or contagion. Much as that may be an initial human response, it is not the response of our tradition.

> Judaism expects us to support the values of our nation in the face of our fears

With all of the importance of venishmartem me'od lenafshotechem, we know of no serious scholars of Jewish law who have ever suggested that Jewish law forbids airplane flights, riding bicycles on Steeles Avenue or slalom skiing. All those activities involve danger, and yet we all assume the benefit derived from them outweighs the danger involved. No one advocates taking blind risks, but we proceed with our activities with reasonable precautions.

Compare our SARS predicament to the issue of travel to Israel. We are all sadly aware that there is danger involved in travel to Israel today. Still, our community leaders urge us – quite correctly – to travel to Israel despite, or perhaps even because of, the danger. (Both of us have visited Israel in the last two months and one is on his way back in the next few weeks.) We know there is much to be gained for both travellers and Israelis from visiting Israel now, and we believe the benefit outweighs the risk. No expert can predict when and where a catastrophe might strike. So we take reasonable precautions and we book our trips. Judaism expects us to support the important values of our nation in the face of our human fears, understandable as they might be.



SARS REPRIEVE: Dr. James Hughes, the director of the United States National Center for Infectious Diseases, speaks at the World Health Organization's (WHO) first global conference on severe acute respiratory syndrome (SARS) in Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia, on June 17. Health officials from around the world gathered for the two-day meeting, certain that the worst of the disease was over but already girding for the next viral epidemic. [RNS Reuters photo by Bazuki Muhammad]

What then can Jewish ethics say to the Toronto Jew who is trying to decide how to respond to families touched by SARS? To us it seems that the required Jewish approach is clear.

If an individual Jew wishes to take a more stringent approach to the mitzvah of venishmartem me'od lenafshotechem by refraining from flying on an airplane, or from riding a bicycle or skiing, that is well and good. But there is no Jewish justification for a person who says that he or she, as part of the observance of venishmartem me'od lenafshotechem, is entitled to marginalize and stigmatize anyone.

Scholars of Jewish law have noted that in fulfilling the mitzvot of helping those in need of help and of not standing idly by while our neighbours suffer, the helper must be willing to risk some amount of danger. For example, the mitzvah of trying to save another person's life must, logically, apply even in cases where there is some (albeit smaller) danger to the rescuer's own life if he or she tries to help.

Sadly, due to the necessary precautions involved in containing SARS, many families in this city have found themselves mourning alone. Technically, Jewish law was followed as closely as possible, but spiritually, these mourners could not avail themselves of the personal contact that, Jewish law teaches us, is a crucial part of the healing process. Once the period of isolation has passed, the community, its institutions and its leaders must not neglect to address this gap. Fear must not stop our community from offering people a way to be welcomed home and an opportunity to heal.

Let us hope the model of those generous and giving people who reached out to the families of SARS victims will inspire all of us to better behaviour. Let us hope, in particular, that the models of these individuals will be noticed by Jewish institutions and their leaders, who will then teach other Jews what Judaism requires of us all.

Judaism does not abandon us to our human fears. It guides us to respond to them on a higher level.

Taking time to listen

I listened in fascination as he told his story. I had heard bits of it before, usually as anecdotes that gave added perspective to one or another of the current issues we often discussed. But on this particular night, his narrative was much more than a succession of disparate memories. It was his uninterrupted recollection of a sequence of events that would so permanently change the course of his life and forever define who he was and where he came from.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

He began by talking about his teenage years in Romania during the early 1940s, about how the normalcy of peacetime was irrevocably shattered as the German army moved in. The comforts of home were soon replaced by more than two years of deprivation and hardship in a forced labour camp. He actually didn't elaborate too much on what happened there, nor on what conditions were like under Communist rule after the Nazis were driven out.

Instead, he seemed to prefer to move on to the next phase of his unfolding saga, jumping ahead to the fall of 1947 when, with the help of the Zionist movement, he was able to reach Bulgaria and there board a freighter filled with 8,000 other Jewish refugees bound for Eretz Yisrael. He well remembers the cramped and difficult voyage through the Bosphorous and Dardanelles and their subsequent diversion to Cyprus by Royal Navy destroyers that had intercepted their ramshackle vessel as it entered the Mediterranean.

What followed was further detention behind barbed wire, this time under the British. The 17 months he spent in that displaced persons camp were intensely unpleasant and demoralizing, but what always seemed to sustain him, despite such adversity, was his conviction that, sooner or later, the political tide would turn and that he, and tens of thousands like him, would eventually be able to find their rightful refuge in Israel. He was right.

Shortly after arriving in Haifa, in February 1949, he moved to the Tel Aviv area. There he met a beautiful young sabra – now his wife of 52 years. He and one of his brothers were later able to re-unite with their sister and aging father and, in 1951, the family came to Montreal, sponsored by their uncle, who had already immigrated to Canada decades before.

Regrettably, space does not permit me to relate more than just a small segment of what my father-in-law told me about his remarkable journey. But perhaps the value of his account is not so much in the recording of it as it is in just listening to it. For therein lies one of the most time-honoured principles of learning: the oral record, passed on from one generation to the next.

Standing on guard

A few mornings ago, I went to a supermarket near my home to do some grocery shopping for the weekend. What could be more banal? In Israel, it's anything but. In Jerusalem, such an outing can be a death-defying act, or worse.

Arriving at the entrance to the grocery store in the Kiryat Yovel neighbourhood, an armed security guard greeted me dryly. "Yesh l'cha neshek? [Do you have a gun?]," he asked me robotically. All the while, he guided his handheld metal detector across my torso and legs, before doing a thorough hand-search of my knapsack.

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

He was risking his life. In a way, so was I. In that very spot, just over a year ago, another security guard blocked a Palestinian suicide bomber from entering the store. In so doing, Haim Smadar, 55, was blown to pieces along with a teenage shopper when the female terrorist detonated her explosives.

"The alert response of the security guard prevented a much greater tragedy," said Jerusalem Police Commander Mickey Levy, shortly after the attack. "He saved many lives."

Sadly, this was but one of many such incidents in recent years in which a security guard thwarted a far worse atrocity and in the process was killed or severely wounded.

"Yesh l'cha neshek?" These days this is one of the more frequently asked questions in Israel, where Palestinian violence has led many people to carry guns. Several times a day, I answer no to security guards and then prepare for the inevitable frisking. As startling and invasive as this search would be to most people in Western countries, it's perfectly normal in Israel's abnormal reality.

Throughout the country, especially in the main cities, security guards are everywhere. In Jerusalem and Tel Aviv, their inspections have become a necessary nuisance and standard procedure at the entrance to bars, cafes, restaurants, nightclubs, cinemas, bus stations, hotels, supermarkets, shopping malls, office buildings and even hospitals.

We have Palestinian mass murderers to thank for that. Security guards have become one of the defining images of a society under siege from terrorists. They are a testament to the more than100 attacks that Palestinian suicide bombers have carried out in Israel since September 2000, mostly on civilian locations, not counting countless other planned attacks that the army and police have aborted.

Israelis have long been accustomed to security guards posted at high-risk, sensitive sites. But now they guard places where once no one would have believed they would ever be needed. Alas, with Palestinian terrorists hell-bent on killing as many Israelis as possible, every place where people frequent is a potential target.

As a result, the security guard business is thriving. The country's 300 security-guard companies can barely keep up with the demand. If the job is virtually the same at every location, the guards on duty vary widely. Standing at entrances like human scarecrows, some are armed with automatic weapons while most pack pistols in holsters or clipped to their belts. Many wield hand-held metal detectors, and the odd one also has a can of mace.

Some guards look neat, others disheveled. Their uniforms differ according to the firm that employs them. Some are spiffy, with well-ironed shirts and vests sporting logos and crests. The attire of others is austere and ruffled. Many are new immigrants from Russia or Ethiopia. While some are young, fit and well-trained, many are not.

Despite their differences, security guards all face the same risk and poor work conditions. Amid reports of widespread mistreatment of guards by their employers, the Knesset Interior Committee looked into the matter last month. Committee Chairman Yuri Stern said that every day Israelis entrust their safety to security guards who risk their lives for a pittance. He decried the shameless exploitation of those who, like human shields, are often the first and last line of defence against Palestinian suicide bombers.

Alexander Bukin, a representative of the Security Guards Association, told the committee that most companies pay the guards less than the minimum wage, impose on them an excessive work schedule and abuse their basic rights. He said guards must put in nearly 300 hours a month to earn a living.

Surely, for their vital role and often life-saving acts of courage, security guards deserve a lot better. Surely, our security is worth it.

Accepting Israel as a Jewish state

At the June 4 Aqaba summit meeting meant to officially kick off the "road map" to the latest Middle East peace process, U.S. President George W. Bush's speech included a specific reference to the recognition of Israel as a Jewish state. A number of Arab leaders and commentators responded angrily, and, once again, the concept of a Jewish state was labelled as racist and unacceptable.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

However, Bush was merely restating the obvious. The United Nations recognized the legitimacy of a Jewish state on Nov. 29 1947, when a two-thirds majority adopted Resolution 181. Under this partition framework, what remained of mandated Palestine (after the British split off a large part to provide a home for the Hashemite family in what became Transjordan) was to be divided into two states – one for the Jews and one for the Arabs. So why all the fuss, more than 55 years later?

The reason is that this issue remains at the core of the Arab-Israeli conflict, and the deep-seated rejectionism that fuels the continuing terror campaign. The real obstacles to peace are not settlements, occupation, refugees, borders or even the conflict over Jerusalem – these are just symptoms and expressions of much deeper but well-hidden causal factors. When all the rhetoric and propaganda are finally stripped away, the primary problem is the Arab rejection of the concept of Jewish sovereignty in Israel.

For decades, the Arab states simply rejected Israel's legitimacy across the board and called for its destruction. More recently, they have become more sophisticated. Some Arab countries, beginning with Egypt and Jordan, have formally and officially accepted Israel's right to exist. However, in most cases, their rejection of Zionism as the "national liberation movement" of the Jewish people has not changed. The clearest evidence was provided three years ago, at the Camp David summit, when Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat rejected any terms – particularly regarding a solution to the dispute on refugee claims and on Jerusalem – that would have meant acceptance of Israel as a Jewish state.

Instead, the propagandists continue their intense efforts to delegitimize the concept of Jewish independence. Arab governments, the United Nations and hundreds of NGOs (funded generously by the European Union and the Canadian government, as well as by well-intentioned but ignorant donors) publicize the absurd claim that a Jewish state is inherently racist. This claim was at the core of the infamous UN World Conference against Racism that took place in Durban, South Africa, in September 2001.

In contrast, no one uses terms such as "racist" or "apartheid" with respect to countries around the world that are officially Muslim, including Egypt, Jordan, and, of course, the Islamic Republic of Iran. There is nothing illegitimate about a country in which the calendar is Jewish, Saturday is the official day of rest, kosher food is generally available and the main language is Hebrew. But for hard-core anti-Israel and anti-Semitic constituencies, Jewish sovereignty is simply unacceptable.

Another excuse used in the attempt to justify rejection of Jewish sovereignty is based on the difficulties this poses for the Arab minority. However, by the same token, Islam's status as Egypt's official religion should be nullified by the presence of a substantial Coptic Christian minority. Similar situations exist in Syria and other Muslim countries. And in North America and Europe, non-Christians minorities are able to make adjustments in a dominant Christian culture. In these societies, under the façade of multiculturalism, the calendars are Christian, as are many other facets of daily life. In other words, this is another excuse for rejecting Israel as a Jewish state.

When Bush pulled back the curtain at Aqaba by talking explicitly about the recognition of Israel as a Jewish state, he exposed this elaborate ruse. Bush and his advisors understand what the Clinton and Peres-Beilin teams failed to consider – that no peace plan can and will go anywhere without acceptance of Jewish sovereignty. In order to avoid a repetition of the Oslo disaster, any road map to peace must begin with a plan to end Palestinian and Arab rejectionism.

The Kirshner File

Henry Ford: an apostle of anti-Semitism

Henry Ford, the American magnate who revolutionized the automobile industry and whose main claim to fame is the inimitable Model-T, was a man driven by conspiracy theories. Not content with mouthing off his cockamamie theories in private, Ford wilfully disseminated them through the medium of the malevolent Protocols of the Elders of Zion, a preposterous Russian tract that claimed Jews were plotting to take over the world and enslave Christians.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The Protocols, as well as The International Jew, a series of venomous essays inspired by that Czarist forgery, were published in the pages of The Dearborn Independent – a newspaper owned by Ford – in the 1920s, a decade of escalating anti-Semitism in the United States.

Threatened by a potentially crippling boycott, Ford eventually closed The Dearborn Independent, issued an abject apology and denied that he was hostile to Jews. But, as Neil Baldwin observes in Henry Ford and the Jews: The Mass Production of Hate (HarperCollins), Ford never really jettisoned his anti-Jewish views.

Baldwin's rambling but intriguing book, which is based on archival correspondence, previously unreferenced oral history transcripts and unpublished Ford family memoirs, plumbs the depths of Ford's bizarre affinity with anti-Semitism.

Born in 1863 and raised on a farm, Ford was a product of "the social atmosphere of the time," as one of his friends recalled. As an adolescent, he devoured The McGuffey Reader, a popular schoolbook featuring William Shakespeare's Shylock and traditional scriptural interpretations condemning Jews for not accepting the gospel of Jesus. As an adult, he was exposed to the Populist political movement, which attributed American railway scandals and economic depressions to the "Rothschilds across the water."

Another major influence was David Starr Jordan, the first president of Stanford University and author of Unseen Empire, which claimed that European Jewish bankers controlled the fate of the world.

Detroit, Ford's home and site of his immense River Rouge manufacturing plants, seemed in sync with his thinking. The city was populated by ethnic minorities but dominated by an Anglo Saxon elite and turned increasingly xenophobic in the 1890s. By 1921, the Ku Klux Klan chapter in Michigan was the largest in the United States.

In common with right-wing populists such as Tom Watson, Ford was obsessed by the spectre of Jewish bankers, who, he theorized, "caused" World War I. "I can't give out the facts now, because I haven't got them all yet," he told a visitor in 1915, "but I'll have them soon."

True to his word, Ford found a way to publicize his rantings by purchasing a rural broadsheet. Edwin Pipp, the first editor of The Dearborn Independent, promised it would be "an instrument of goodwill." Administered by Ford's parochial secretary of German ancestry, Ernest Gustav Liebold, it drew on a stable of writers. But the star of the staff was doubtless Billy Cameron, an anglophile who held that the British, rather than the "modern Hebrews," were the "chosen people."

Beginning in May 1920, The Dearborn Independent launched the first of 91 successive articles entitled The International Jew: The World's Problem. The essays, published in book form in 16 languages, including German, described Jews as perpetual and baleful aliens and warned the "proud Gentile race" to wake up and arm itself against "a long-despised race."

Serializing the Protocols, The Dearborn Independent informed readers that the objective of Jews was to wear down Christian societies by "dissensions, animosities, feuds and famines." A dyed-in-the-wool anti-Semite who never doubted its so-called verities, Liebold said, "If the Protocols had not been authentic, we never would have published them. We took the Protocols at their face value." Norman Cohn, a historian who has written about the Protocols, believes that The Dearborn Independent had a marked impact. As he put it: "The International Jew probably did more than any other work to make the Protocols famous."

Needless to say, the libellous material printed by Ford's rag aroused the anger and indignation of the Jewish community, most of whose leaders preferred quiet diplomacy to resolve the issue.

In this spirit, Louis Marshall, an illustrious lawyer and president of the American Jewish Committee, dispatched a telegraph to Ford in which he accused him of "palpable fabrications." Marshall received an immediate reply. The Dearborn Publishing Company rudely rejected his plea to stop the inflammatory articles.

Leo Franklin, a Reform rabbi, Ford's neighbour and one of the few Jews who knew him personally, decided to approach Ford. Like some Jews, Rabbi Franklin was of the view that Ford was either unaware of the articles in question or that he was "the victim of evil advisors."

Yet, as Baldwin points out, Ford was fully abreast of the situation. "Everything that was being done was being done because of Mr. Ford's wishes in carrying out the idea of revealing to the public the facts pertaining to Jewish activities," Liebold said.

When Rabbi Franklin asked for a retraction, Ford refused. Incensed, the rabbi returned a customized Model T he had recently received from Ford as a gift. He also sent Ford a stiff letter complaining that the articles were poisoning "the minds of the masses against the Jews." Liebold chastized the rabbi, hoping he would come to realize that "Mr. Ford's position is correct."

Henry Ford

To add insult to injury, Ford, through a spokesperson, subsequently reiterated his belief that the articles provided a service. "Let there be no ambiguity about the… articles in progress," the statement declared. "They are 'lessons' for the American public to 'learn,' not 'attacks as has been commonly misconstrued. We do not hate the Jews."

Ford may actually have believed his own lies. In his heart of hearts, he may have thought he did not have a prejudiced bone in his body. After all, his chief architect was Albert Kahn, a German Jew who had designed his factories. Kahn, however, was disillusioned after reading The Dearborn Independent, so much so that he avoided meetings with Ford and trips to his plants.

In 1921, Ford suddenly ordered his newspaper to cease publication. His reasons were clear. He feared a Jewish boycott of his cars and wished to buff up his image. But in his memoirs, published in the following year, Ford insinuated that Jews exerted an insidious influence in America. In an interview with Collier's Magazine, Ford denigrated Jews and used such choice phrases as "these Jew financiers." Shortly afterward, The Dearborn Independent endorsed university admission quotas for Jews.

Nathan Strauss, the co-proprietor of a department store chain in New York, could no longer bear these calumnies. In 1926, he issued a public challenge to Ford to stop his "campaign of slander." But to no avail. In 1927, under the moral persuasion of nationally syndicated columnist Arthur Brisbane, Ford decided "to discontinue absolutely and permanently… all articles such as those that had given offense to Jews."

The upshot of it all is that he issued a public apology and shut down The Dearborn Independent.

The apologetic letter, written by Marshall, was somewhat disengenuous. After suggesting that his managers had failed to keep him fully abreast of its contents, Ford described Jews as "fellow brothers" and asked for forgiveness. He then closed the newspaper.

But had Ford changed? Not according to Baldwin. Jottings in his private papers from the 1930s, deposited in the Ford Motor Company Archives, strongly indicate that Ford's dislike of Jews remained constant. One entry reads: "The Jew is out to enslave you."

And yet, for appearances' sake, Ford pretended he had reformed himself. In an essay in the December 1933 edition of The American Hebrew, Ford declared, "I am not a Jew hater."

Less than five years later, on his 75th birthday, Ford accepted a special medal from Nazi Germany, the highest honour given to "distinguished foreigners." Ford also continued to lunch with Charles Coughlin, the Detroit priest whose weekly radio sermons stirred up anti-Semitism, and maintained that reports concerning Germany's anti-Semitic policies had been exaggerated.

Ford's grandson, Henry Ford II, who succeded his father Edsel as president of the firm, took bold steps to disassociate Ford from the whiff of anti-Semitism and supported Jewish charities at home and abroad.

In a final break with the past, Ford was the sole sponsor of the television debut of Steven Spielberg's film, Schindler's List.

How ironic.

Time for some summer reading

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

We've come to our third annual summer reading review, replete with my own subjective fancies.

The God of Old, by James Kugel: I suppose it is a commonplace that all individuals and cultures view reality through their own particular prism. But journeying through this book truly reminds the reader of how different the experience of God was for biblical man compared to what it is for us, interpreting as we do through layers of Greek thought and mystical flight. Prof. Kugel convincingly shows the thin line between the material and spiritual, and the not totally unexpected shock of encounter for many characters with a God who often intrudes into the ancient world.

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

Wrapped in a Holy Flame, by Zalman Schachter-Shalomi: For those who like their traditional spirituality wrapped in Jewish renewal garb, this stimulating look in to chassidic storytelling and parable construction is just the ticket. All the old favourites are here from the Baal Shem Tov to Rebbe Nachman of Bratslav, all presented in Rabbi Schachter's inimitable New Sage panache.

By His Light and Leaves of Faith, both by Aharon Lichtenstein: At times tendentious, Rav Lichtenstein's writing style is an acquired taste, but worth the struggle. A fiercely intelligent representative of a certain kind of fusion of Torah and secular studies, Rav Lichtenstein focuses on the primacy of Torah study and yet the beauty available in much of creation. Cardinal Newman and Dostoevsky are invoked in the same breath as the Rambam and numerous talmudic citations.

One People, Two Worlds, co-authored by Ammiel Hirsch and Yosef Reinman: Here a confession is in order – I did not particularly like this book, filled as it is with sometimes screeching and fairly predictable rhetoric on both sides. The real story here is an editor's attempt to induce a Reform and a haredi rabbi to engage in an e-mail correspondence together, with the nostalgically liberal hope of creating "dialogue" or even a bridge between two realities. But as the title infers, neither man truly seems to understand or acknowledge the sharp critique of his opponent, and instead both remain focused on delivering their set speeches. I include it here as a cautionary tale about trying to generalize about what constitutes "Orthodox" or "Reform." Indeed, I found that neither rabbi spoke for me.

Finally, a rather breezy but fairly stimulating effort by Nathan Lopes-Cardozo, simply titled Thoughts to Ponder. Although the book self-consciously does not set out to delve deep below the surface, it is driven by Rabbi Cardozo's creative and often courageous pronouncements on a wide spectrum of matters, from pluralism to Beethoven, Spinoza to Moses' identity crisis as he emerges from an Egyptian palace to face his Jewish future.

Alas, none of these volumes will vie just yet with Harry Potter in a commercial sense, but each has some rewards for the persistent explorer. Happy reading.

Hair covering an individual choice, BAYT seminar told

By JENNIFER M. PAQUETTE
Special to the CJN

Ahava Spillman was adamant. "I will never cover my hair," she used to say. "I'd do anything else… but there was not a chance."

Years later, she now often finds herself defending the practice from beneath a gorgeous red sheitel (wig).

"Hair is very powerful," Spillman said, at "A Hair Affair," a recent adult education event at Beth Avraham Yoseph Synagogue. Originally, the women-only evening was to feature Lynne Schreiber, journalist and editor of the anthology Hide and Seek: Jewish Women and Hair Covering. When Schreiber – who's expecting a baby – cancelled due to SARS, organizers thought of bailing out.

Instead, they called Spillman, who lives nearby, to help shed light on this emotional subject.

Spillman's talk drew on her own experiences, positive and negative, such as when one of her male students at Seneca College, where she teaches English and communications, walked up and yanked her sheitel – hard.

Not sure how to respond, Spillman decided to act as if it was her real hair. "I said 'Ouch!'… Miraculously, it didn't move." The student shook his head: "I knew it wasn't true."

Apparently, somebody in the Jewish community who knew her had told him she wore a sheitel, and he put the rumour to the test.

"I was not a happy person," Spillman said. Not that she's not proud of her sheitel. "My colleagues know… but [with] only 14 weeks in a semester," she said she doesn't generally explain it to students.

Hair covering in a secular world is just one of many topics in Hide and Seek, a collection of essays written from a variety of perspectives, both emotional and scholarly.

Spillman read selections, such as one by a woman who was originally offended that women had to cover their hair "to save men from sin." Another woman writes of how proud and excited she was the day after her wedding when her mother-in-law shaved her head.

Spillman's audience was a microcosm of opinion on hair covering: many came with hair completely uncovered, but others wore hats, scarves or sheitels – long, short, curly, straight and everything in between.

The origins of the debate, Spillman explained, lie in a brief Talmudic passage describing the punishment of a suspected adulteress, saying "the priest should uncover the head of the woman." From this, rabbis deduced that women's hair must have customarily been covered – or else uncovering it wouldn't have been humiliating.

That's it, said Spillman. "Because of 10 words, something that's defined who you are… you brush it; you curl it… and then you get married, and the next day, you do something else."

From 10 words, different opinions emerged, and different practices from one woman to another. Some cover only on Shabbat, some only in synagogue. Some uncover at home, while others would never even go to sleep bare-headed. And many, like Spillman, eventually go from being totally opposed to being wholehearted supporters.

Spillman divided listeners into smaller groups, and many issues emerged from these conversations. One group wondered whether head covering made sense if a sheitel looks better than a woman's own hair. From her own experience, Spillman said it feels different inside the sheitel, and the group discussed who women should be covering their hair for – others or themselves.

The last chapter of Hide and Seek lists reasons why Orthodox women decide against hair covering. Just because a woman has been raised Orthodox, Spillman said, shouldn't make one assume it's an easy decision, or that she's made it without careful thought.

Hair covering is always an individual choice, she said. "People take it on for different reasons."

For those interested in trying a new look, the evening featured wigs and hats in many colours and styles.

One woman, a brunette, grabbed a long, blonde sheitel and modelled it to friends' cheers. "I've always wanted to be a blonde," she said.

As with mikvah observance, in previous generations, hair covering wasn't discussed. Now, women are reclaiming it, making it a thoughtful part of their own Judaism, Spillman said.

"It's very personal, very feminine… very us," she said.

An absorbing tableau

Michelangelo and the Pope's Ceiling*, by Ross King, Random House, $42.50.

Pope Julius II, known as "Il Terribile," was impatient and tyrannical. A man of indomitable will, he was also one of the great art patrons in the history of the Roman Catholic Church. Engaged in rebuilding St. Peter's Basilica, he demanded financial help from bishops throughout Europe and spent more than 70,000 gold ducats in the church's planning and construction.

He was especially eager to remodel the Sistine Chapel, and in 1508, he commissioned Michelangelo Buonarroti to cover the 10,000-square-foot ceiling with scenes and characters from the Hebrew Scriptures. Having completed his much-celebrated statue of David, Michelangelo had begun carving what he hoped would be his magnum opus, an immense and ornately sculpted tomb for the pope. But early into the project the pope's patronage was withdrawn and a papal injunction forced the artist to his destiny working on the 65-foot ceiling.

Michelangelo was reluctant. He considered himself a sculptor rather than a painter. Moreover, he was inexperienced in the difficult art of fresco painting.

For the next four years, he would labour over the vast ceiling. The result was one of the greatest masterpieces of all time.

Once, in an argument about the progress of the work, the pope struck Michelangelo with his staff and threatened to have him thrown from the scaffolding. On another occasion, when Julius sneaked a look at the work in progress, Michelangelo "repelled him by hurling planks at his head. Julius angrily fled the scene, bellowing curses and leaving Michelangelo to contemplate the possible repercussions of his outburst. Fearing for his life, he escaped through a window and bolted to Florence."

Though one may envisage Michelangelo as an aging, dissatisfied man, he was actually only 37 when the ceiling paintings were finished, and unlike his patron, who died a few months later, he had yet more than half a century to live.

Julius, while pleased that his dream had come true, was not entirely satisfied with the work. He objected to the muted colour scheme and thought Michelangelo might still improve his work by touching it up with lustrous colours, particularly gold. This suggestion the artist rejected, saying that the prophets and holy men, while they were rich in spiritual wealth, were not so in material goods.

A deft writer and diligent researcher, King debunks much of the Sistine Chapel mythology. Michelangelo did not actually spend four years painting the ceiling on his back, for example, as he and his assistants developed scaffolds that allowed them to stand. Also, Michelangelo did not work alone; his assistants provided plenty of help.

This work is an absorbing tableau of how the Sistine Chapel was created by a grudging genius against a background of intrigue and upheaval in 16th century Rome.

Baseball and Judaism

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Question: What is God's favourite sport?Answer: Baseball. Because the Torah begins (in English) "In the big inning." [http://scheinerman.net/judaism/humor/riddles.html]

Although Judaism may be a bit older than baseball, the religion and the sport have much in common – at least if you do a search on the Internet. Despite occasional friction between the two, there are far more references to their unique bond and even to the lessons rabbis have derived from the game. Today, Judaism and Baseball on the World Wide Web. (Special thanks to Elliot Katz for suggesting today's topic.)

For Neil Rubin, the timing of the start of the baseball season says it all. "Funny how it always coincides with Passover, which is about our birth as a nation with one focus – reaching the Promised Land [the World Series], and about coming from the evils of Egypt [a dark, wet winter]." And then there are the personal memories of Baltimore's Memorial Stadium. While everyone else was feasting on soft pretzels and Coke, Rubin munched on matzah and macaroons. "If you can keep the faith on opening day, we all agreed, you can be a Jew anywhere, any time." [http://www.jewishworldreview.com/0398/rubin032998.html]

Half a century ago, even the Lubavitcher Rebbe taught a lesson thanks to baseball. The Rebbe asked a visiting bar mitzvah boy about his favourite game. When he responded "baseball," the Rebbe explained the special lesson for a boy coming of age. "In your heart you have a big field. The two sides are the yetzer tov [the good inclination] and the yetzer hara, [the negative drives]. Until now, they played kids' stuff, but from now on the game's for real. Remember, just as in baseball, the side that plays best will win. If you only want to, you can always overcome your yetzer hara." [http://www.lchaimweekly.org/lchaim/5757/474.htm]

Rabbi Richard D. Angler of Boca Raton's Congregation B'nai Israel sees many parallels between Judaism and baseball. Both are "sophisticated:" you can't expect to appreciate baseball or Judaism right away. And both are firmly rooted in history. Just as "every baseball game is part of every other baseball game that has ever been played… We say that when a Jew is born, we are already 4,000 years old… Judaism, like baseball, like family, like everything of value in life works best when we make the long-term commitment to it." [http://www.cbiboca.org/rda/101196.html]

Yosef Abramowitz is a true believer in the Boston Red Sox. But it was with some apprehension that Abramowitz joined his father and his six-year-old daughter for their first three-generation baseball outing. Let's just say that things didn't go quite as planned until the game was over and Aliza confronted a bit of reality outside of Fenway Park, far from her own Jewish neighbourhood. [http://www.jewishaz.com/jewishnews/980911/yosi.shtml]

For all the heart-warming associations between Judaism and baseball, Rabbi Rami Shapiro saw nothing pleasant a few years ago, when the Florida Marlins hosted a playoff game against the Atlanta Braves on Yom Kippur. Rabbi Shapiro was distressed when he heard about fans trying to decide whether to attend the "Great American Pastime" or the "Great American Fast-time." And he wasn't pleased with Jews who tried to have the best of both worlds by trying to get the game time changed. "This is a mistake. Judaism asks us to make choices all the time. The choice is always the same: do I choose for holiness or selfishness? To get the Marlins to eliminate this one choice [even if that were fair or possible] simply misses the point. Serious Jews must make serious choices. And sometimes those choices call for personal sacrifice…" [http://makeashorterlink.com/?B39012405]

When David Bedein read Rabbi Shapiro's plea, it brought back some old memories. Many years before Bedein became Jerusalem bureau chief for the Israel Resources News Agency, he was a Phillies fan in his hometown of Philadelphia. In 1964, young David took an afternoon detour on the second day of Rosh Hashanah to take in a game at Connie Mack Stadium. You'll have to read the entire piece to find out exactly what happened, but let's just say there was no joy in Philly that year… and David has always felt responsible. [http://israelbehindthenews.com/Oct-13.htm#Baseball]

Next week, the conclusion of our double-header as we look at some great Jewish players and dabble in Kabbalah, baseball-style.

Shayne Smith: A teen like any other, but not quite

By ADAM GRACHNIK
Special to The CJN

Shayne Smith would make any parent proud.

He's won a national sports championship, is a volunteer, has endlessly flowing energy, is a captivating public speaker who motivates others, met the Queen, had tea with Nelson Mandela and is playing telephone tag with World Wrestling Entertainment (WWE) super babe, Trish Stratus. He worships – and resembles – rapper Eminem and is obsessed with video games, but hates vegetables.

When you chat with him, Shayne Smith seems like any other 14-year-old who loves sports, rap music, video games and girls.

This year, the Don Mills Collegiate student was named one of 10 Ontario Junior Citizens of the year, an award that recognizes outstanding young people who help define and strengthen their communities.

"It's very hard for me to judge if I deserve it. It [community involvement] is not something special, it's just something I do," the teen says, sitting on a chair with one of his prosthetic legs standing near a wall several feet away.

Smith is, as he puts it, "differently abled."

At four months of age, he was infected with meningococcal septicaemia – an infection of the blood stream. The doctors gave him a two per cent chance of survival. He pulled through, but in the battle for his life, he lost his legs below the knees, his left arm and part of his right hand, and endured multiple skin grafts.

Smith has not allowed his "limitations" to hold him back, and at 14, he has accomplished more than most achieve in a lifetime.

"I consider myself so lucky. What keeps me going is the fact that I am alive. I had a near-death situation and I made it through that. The way I see it is that I can live through anything," says the teen, who has met lots of famous people but says Trish Stratus is his favourite because he's "in love with her."

Smith's motto is: "You never know what life is going to throw at you, so you have to live life to the fullest."

And the self-labelled "gifted rapper" has done just that.

Teenage Shayne Smith proudly displays a plaque for his award as one of 10 Ontario Junior Citizens of the Year, earned for his outstanding community involvement.

He is a point-guard with the Variety Village Rolling Raptors, a team that recently captured the Canadian National Mini-Wheelchair Basketball Championship. In a few weeks, he plans to try out for the Canadian National Sledge Hockey Team.

"He's energetic, very adaptive and friendly," says his basketball coach, Jeanette Lambert, adding that Smith has the talent to eventually play on Canada's National Wheelchair Basketball Team.

Smith's athleticism and character have developed immensely, thanks in large part, he says, to the Variety Village Sport Training and Fitness Centre, which opened in Toronto in 1981 to serve children with special needs.

Smith joined Variety when he was eight years old. He was introduced to wheelchair basketball and now plays there twice a week, swims, and acts as one of its ambassadors by speaking at large events. He also participated in the outreach program, doing demonstrations at schools and speaking to other children.

"They have given me life. I would be at home playing video games, doing nothing if it wasn't for Variety," says Smith, who was recently picked by Vince Carter personally, as one of Carter's Mr Big Heroes, after the two shot hoops together at the Air Canada Centre.

His family is also vital to him.

"Not only is she mom, dad, brother, sister, doctor, taxi driver. She does everything. She doesn't have to get up to help me get ready for school. She doesn't have to come home from work a little bit early to get me to practise," but she does, says Smith of his mother Joanne Milner. He quickly adds that his grandmother, Shirley, who lives with Smith and his mom, is "awesome" and that "he would do anything for her."

His mom says he's a child who makes being his mom easy, because of his attitude.

"As good a basketball player as he is, there are certain things he can't do. Daily living is hard for him… He teaches me stuff every day. You just have to be thankful for the life you have. He is always so positive," Milner, a South African native explains.

In public, people often stare at him, but Smith says, "It can't be easy for them looking and seeing someone who looks different. What people see is hard for them to understand.

"It's also because I'm so sexy," he adds with a smile.

He says he's proud of his religion, adding that all his friends know he's Jewish, and that he has a circle of "buddies" from different cultures.

His academic marks, his mother says, are improving and he hopes to win an academic and athletic scholarship to play wheelchair basketball in Illinois or Texas. But for now, when he's not rapping, playing or talking to others, he will simply continue "loving life."

"If you love life, you're set," he says.

United Synagogue head tackles Conservative issues

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

When people hear that Judy Yudof keeps kosher, they often tell her they didn't know she was Orthodox. That scenario illustrates one of the challenges she faces as president of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism: educating people about what it means to be a Conservative Jew.

Yudof, 58, was in Toronto recently to attend the Ateret Kavod award reception honouring Ron and Heather Hoffman. She then met with lay leaders in Montreal before returning home to Austin, Tex.

Judy Yudof

The first woman to head the congregational arm of the Conservative Movement, which represents 760 congregations, Yudof made headlines early this year in the Jewish media for a letter she was working on – but has never actually sent – asking the movement's rabbis to reassess the halachic status of gays and lesbians.

Speaking about lower-profile initiatives like organizing task forces on services offered by United Synagogue to its members, and determinating congregational dues, the organization's Canadian region president, Paul Kochberg, said Yudof is "forward-sighted. She's implemented some really good strategies to improve the efficiency of the organization in delivering its services."

In person, Yudof is down-to-earth in both manner and appearance. Sans makeup – she has yet to change clothes for the evening's event – she is calm and matter-of-fact as she explains that the letter that received so much publicity is still in her computer. The executive council of the Rabbinical Assembly voted independently to bring the issue to the movement's committee on Jewish law and standards, she said.

Although Yudof has been criticized for introducing what could be a divisive issue, she said she has confidence in the rabbis on the law committee. "This may be naiveté, but I just can't believe that the whole future of the Conservative movement rests on [whether] we develop a different attitude toward how we regard homosexual members of our community… I feel there's a whole lot more to religion than this."

The most-discussed implication involves the ordination of openly gay students as Conservative rabbis, which is currently prohibited. Before she began drafting the letter, it was brought to Yudof's attention several times that there was discomfort over that policy, she said. Likewise, she heard that people were disturbed over United Synagogue's policy of not hiring openly gay people in role model positions, although she said the same policy applies to people who do not observe Shabbat.

Yudof stressed that ordination does not fall within the purview of United Synagogue, but rather is up to the rabbis.

Other issues she's taken on since becoming president in February 2002 include increasing collaboration with other arms of the movement such as the Rabbinical Assembly and the Jewish Theological Seminary; "growing" the movement; and creating "Shabbat communities" where the Sabbath brings people together to celebrate.

A move away from Conservative Judaism toward modern Orthodoxy among some observant Conservative young people is also a concern, she said.

"The United Synagogue runs some of the most outstanding youth programs anywhere. We turn out kids who become extremely knowledgeable and committed." When they find a group of like-minded peers in the Orthodox movement and not in their own synagogues, it's "sad for the Conservative Movement… It's not a loss to the Jews, because these young people go on to have wonderful families and to transmit values of Judaism, but we see it as a loss to the Conservative Movement, because the same energy and excitement doesn't get transmitted to their contemporaries within the synagogue. I don't have an easy answer."

Yudof changed her own level of Jewish observance years ago when she became a regional leader in the Conservative movement, she said.

As a child in Philadelphia, Yudof's home was not observant, but she has "cameo memories" of visits to her grandparents' Orthodox synagogue.

She became involved in synagogue life after moving to Austin in 1971. At the time, she was pregnant with her oldest child. The family has lived in Austin ever since, except for a recent five-year stint in St. Paul, Minn., when her husband Mark, was president of the University of Minnesota.

Conference denounces both Israel and PA

As one delegate put it: "Palestine is unique and should never be wedded to colonialist Israel."

Yet another delegate claimed that the phrase "Zionist entity" rightly sums up Israel. "As soon as you say Israel, you recognize Israel. We should use the phrase Zionist entity."

In what passed for a compromise, delegates said that the word "Israel" should only be used in reference to "atrocities" committed by Israel against the Palestinians.

Tables outside the conference room displayed brochures published by the pro-Palestinian International Solidarity Movement (ISM), which sends volunteers to Israel to protest its occupation of the West Bank and Gaza.

Last March in what the Israeli army has called an accident, American ISM volunteer Rachel Corrie was killed trying to prevent an army bulldozer from demolishing a Palestinian home in Gaza.

The ISM calls for Israel's withdrawal from the territories and its "immediate compliance" with United Nations resolutions pertaining to the right of return. It also supports the right of Palestinians to engage in armed struggle against Israel.

Descendants of early Jewish Canadian meet in Michigan

By LAUREN KRUGEL
CJN Intern

Sixty descendants of one of the first Jewish settlers in Canada met for the first time at Fort Michilimackinac in northern Michigan at the end of May.

Ezekiel Solomons, who arrived in Canada from Austria in 1761, ran a lucrative fur trading post in the Great Lakes area, said lawyer and historian Sheldon Godfrey. It was Godfrey's book Search Out the Land: The Jews and the Growth of Equality in British Colonial America 1740-1867, co-written with his wife Judith, that inspired Solomons' descendants to contact each other and plan a reunion.

"By and large, this [era of North American Jewish history] is not taught in schools," said Godfrey, adding it is generally taught that Jews only started to come to North America after the pogroms in the late 1800s.

"This is absolutely not the case. Jews were here right from the beginning," he said. "It's as much our country as anyone else's."

Godfrey said one of the most interesting things about the reunion is that aside from he and his wife, who were honorary guests, none of the attendees was Jewish. Many were members of the Catholic clergy and some belonged to Métis, Ojibwa and other aboriginal groups.

In British North America, there were virtually no Jewish women, so Solomons, like many other Jewish settlers, married outside his religion and raised his children as Catholics, Godfrey said.

Brother Thom Smith, a Franciscan friar in Indian River, Mich., started researching his roots after a plaque was excavated at Fort Michilimackinac, 20 miles from his parish.

The plaque commemorated Michigan's first Jewish settler (northern Michigan was part of Upper Canada until the British lost the territory in the War of 1812). Smith said he was fascinated to learn that Solomons was his direct ancestor.

Through Internet chat groups and genealogy sites, Smith managed to get in touch with numerous members of the Solomons family. Most live in or around Sault Ste. Marie, but others were found in Wisconsin, Michigan, and Florida.

Smith said exploring his Jewish heritage helped him to learn more about Christianity.

"We're finding our roots as individuals and as Christians," he said.

Through learning about Judaism, Smith said he gained a deeper understanding of the Old Testament and the Hebrew roots of many of the prayers he sings at mass.

> Solomons married outside his religion and raised children as Catholics

Smith said he was also inspired by Solomons' commitment to his faith and tolerance of other cultures.

"He was able to stay faithful and lead a religious life, but let his wife and kid have their own way," he said, adding that when Solomons' home was excavated, the chicken bones and other food remnants indicated he had managed to keep kosher throughout his years in Canada.

Solomons also trekked through the wilderness to Montreal to attend High Holy Day services each year, Godfrey said. When the Montreal shul no longer held services, he went all the way to New York City, where he died in 1804.

"We know how important God was on his journey," Smith said.

Rotenberg family members meet for the first time

By LAUREN KRUGEL
CJN Intern

Before their first reunion on June 21, most members of the Rotenberg family had never met each other.

Ranging from age 17 days to 95 years, each of the 81 guests was in some way connected to nine brothers and sisters who at the turn of the century immigrated to Canada from the Polish shtetl of Ivansk.

Belle, Nathan, Freda, Mary, Sam, Dora, Muggs, Percy and Sol Rotenberg had 40 children between them. Three generations later, there are 155 living Rotenberg descendants around the world.

Lisa Matthews decided she wanted to bring her family together three months ago. "It was a humongous amount of work," the spirited interior designer said.

> 'We had some wild times'

For the reunion, Matthews compiled and printed a gigantic five-generation family tree. She compiled a family cookbook and a directory of phone numbers and birthdays for guests to take home. She also collected family photographs for a video slide show.

"It's wonderful. I'm glad I put the effort forth," she said.

Judith Rockert, daughter of Belle Rotenberg said it's "invigorating, just extraordinary" that she had the opportunity to reunite with her first cousins'.

She said many years ago, they formed a "cousin's club."All 40 first cousins would gather every so often in Toronto, Detroit or Windsor to catch up.

"We had some wild times," said Rockert, who said she was the baby of the group.

The reunion did not come without its obstacles. Matthews said many out-of-towners chose not to come to Toronto because of SARS, although some relatives from Sherbrooke, Que., Arizona, Costa Rica, Midland, Ont., and Atlanta came to meet and reunite with relatives.

Two-and-a-half weeks before the reunion, Matthews' sister Lesley gave birth to her daughter Alexandra at Mount Sinai Hospital, where she was one of five new mothers who came in direct contact with a SARS patient. Lesley, her husband Sid and their newborn baby ended their quarantine just in time for the reunion.

Matthews said she did not want this to be a typical family reunion. One activity she planned was "human bingo." Guests had to find other family members who had certain attributes, such as "was born before 1930" and "has had a bat mitzvah."

"I didn't want it to be just a bunch of people in a room. I wanted to mix everybody up," said Matthews.

For the kids, Matthews planned an arts and crafts activity. They decorated paper plates as members of their family and hung them on a hanger to make a family tree mobile.

"That way, the kids have an idea that they're part of something bigger," she said.

Each guest also received a colour-coded name tag to let others know which of the nine Rotenberg lines they came from.

After the video slide show, Matthews received a standing ovation for her hard work. "It was my 15 minutes of being a rock star. It was nice to feel appreciated," she said.

Fixing the world, 1,000 blankets at a time

By JENNIFER M. PAQUETTE
Special to the CJN

Tikkun olam means many things to many people. To some, it's feeding the hungry or meeting Third World medical needs. For the sisterhood craft group of Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue, tikkun olam begins at home – and brightens the lives of children across Canada.

Six years ago, the craft group joined Project Linus, an international organization named for the Peanuts cartoon character and his famous security blanket created by Charles Schultz. Project Linus has a simple goal: to provide handmade blankets for children in hospitals and shelters, for whom security is a rare luxury.

Fast-forward to 1,000 blankets later – 1,000 individual works of art knitted or crocheted by the craft group's volunteers, who put in long hours each day.

"We started with 10 people," says member Marian Brody. "People brought their friends." The group now has between 20 and 30 members at any given time.

Noreen Kasman says that as the number of blankets grew beyond the group's expectations, "somebody said maybe we'll make a party when we get to 1,000."

Which is just what the group did at Beth David Synagogue June 17.

"I'm on number 296," says Esther Robinson, 90, who keeps a journal of her own contributions, with brief comments on each blanket she's created. "It's so easy, and it's for a good cause."

Initially there was some discussion about whether the group could support Project Linus's sending of blankets to organizations such as the Scott Mission, a Christian non-denominational agency in Toronto that seeks to give spiritual as well as physical sustenance to the poor.

But Kasman says, "We decided that we didn't care; these kids are homeless... if they needed to have a blanket to comfort them, that was fine with us."

The group also decided, as a sideline, to contribute dozens of hats and scarves to Toronto's Native Men's Residence (NaMeRes) to be distributed to the homeless during the winter months.

"But we don't count those," Kasman says.

Each blanket is designed by the individual, and members are happy to donate their time and creativity.

"I don't know what I'd do without this," Robinson says.

The only difficulty, Kasman says, is in paying for the yarn. The group has searched repeatedly for donations.

"We wrote to several companies, three or four manufacturers, and got no response," Kasman says. "Even if they gave us a gift certificate... we would buy their yarn, and we spend hundreds."

But the expenses are quickly forgotten when members talk about thank you notes they've received from families as far away as the Yukon and Nova Scotia, although most of the blankets remain closer to home, going to children at the Hospital for Sick Children or Scarborough Grace Hospital.

"Kids love them," says Robinson.

"The kids and the parents," Brody adds. "It's so great that kids leave the hospital with one of these."

Each blanket comes with a tag bearing the name and address of Beth David Sisterhood, rather than the name of the participant who created it.

"The thought that someone whose child is ill and got a blanket took the time to write a 'thank you' is very moving," Kasman says. "To open that envelope is just incredible.

"One letter was from a 12-year-old girl... who had a kidney replaced. I thought it was very touching, that a nearly teenager would write a 'thank you.'"

Sometimes recipients who are not Jewish are thrown off by the synagogue's name. The group has received several letters addressed, "Dear Beth."

But all the thanks are precious to them. Robinson keeps a photograph the group received of a man holding a child wrapped in a blanket with a crocheted rose peeking out from the design.

"That's my signature," she says. "I crochet a rose onto each one."

For Kasman, 1,000 blankets is just the beginning. "That was something we thought we would aim for."

By now, the group is past 1,040.

"Hopefully, this is never-ending," she says. "We don't like having idle hands."

Shaarei Zion moves to temporary home at Beth Tikvah Synagogue

Shaarei Zion Congregation, which has held Orthodox services on Shabbat and Yom Tovim for 20 years at Associated Hebrew Schools' Leslie Street campus, has moved to temporary quarters at Beth Tikvah Synagogue and will daven there starting this coming Shabbat.

Beth Tikvah, a Conservative shul, is located at 3080 Bayview Ave., south of Finch Avenue. It's approximately three miles from Associated's branch on Leslie, north of Cummer Avenue.

The move became necessary due to the sale of the Leslie Street property to the Canadian Memorial Chiropractic College, said Shaarei Zion President Jack Saunders.

"We spent the past year looking for a site that would suit our congregation for the long term. However, we were unsuccessful," he said.

"Our membership has been contracting in size for a number of years, making it difficult – if not impossible – for us to make the kind of large rental payment that a more commercial location would charge. And, of course, being an Orthodox shul, we needed to find a location within walking distance of our present site."

Saunders said Shaarei Zion is "very grateful" to Beth Tikvah "for providing us with a home this summer in their staff room."

Saunders, who said the agreement between Shaarei Zion and Beth Tikvah is for an initial three-month period, hopes the new location attracts more congregants.

"There may be some people not currently attending for whom this venue is closer for them, making it more convenient for them to join us on Shabbat and Yom Tov. We certainly could use an influx of new members, because we do struggle now to reach a minyan."

U.S. fund brings 27 Israeli campers to Canada

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Twenty-seven Israeli youngsters will attend Jewish summer camps in Canada for six weeks this summer thanks to a grant from a San Francisco-based foundation.

The Richard and Rhoda Goldman Fund has committed $1.2 million (US) to help more than 200 young Israelis attend North American camps. In Canada, camps Ramah and Shomria are beneficiaries of the funding through the Foundation for Jewish Camping in New York. They will receive 60 per cent of the camp fee for each camper, and travel costs will be covered as well. They are currently raising funds to cover the extra 40 per cent.

A Goldman Fund press release said the program was initiated in response to violence in the Middle East that "prevent[s] American youth from going to Israel." But Ora Merin, shlichah for Hashomer Hatzair, the secular Zionist youth movement, and education director for Hashomer Hatzair's Camp Shomria, said that was not the case for her organization.

"We still have a group going to Israel," Merin said. Sixteen teenagers will participate in the group's annual leadership program for Grade 10 students. Although that number is smaller compared to the 40 students who took part two years ago, Merin said the youth group has a smaller contingent of Grade 10s this year. Only two are not going, she said.

Counsellors trained to deal with the issues

Shomria, located near Perth, Ont., will host a total of 25 Israelis, and 16 through the Goldman program. The students, who are in Grades 7, 8 and 9, are all residents of northern Israel.

"It's very important for me that the Israelis go home with wonderful memories," said Merin. "I want there to be friendship between the Israeli and Canadian campers that will last forever. I hope all the kids will learn much more about Israel, that Israelis are regular people who have fun, like music, love and hate like everyone else. And I hope they'll be anxious to go to Israel."

For a good mifgash, or encounter, said Merin, the campers need to share work and live together and learn about each other over an extended period of time.

She expects the first week will be taken up with ice-breakers and team-building exercises before campers tackle tougher issues like why the non-Israeli Jews live here rather than in Israel, what rights they have to voice opinions on Israel, and what they will be doing at the time their Israeli counterparts begin army service.

Counsellors have been trained to deal with the issues, and each group has at least one Hebrew-speaking counsellor.

"We're all one nation of Jewish people," says Merin. "We share the same faith."

Camp Ramah, in Utterson, Ont., will host 11 Israeli campers, age 14 and 15. Last year the camp, which is affiliated with the Conservative movement, brought in Israeli campers who were injured or had immediate family members injured in terror attacks, said director Michael Wolf.

In Ramah's case, bringing Israeli kids to Canada is an attempt to compensate for a decrease in the number of youth visiting Israel, although this year 23 Canadians are going to Israel with Ramah. Last year there was only one.

"A lot of our campers who automatically went to Israel weren't going the last few years, so we wanted to bring Israel to them," Wolf said.

U of T prof Na'amat's woman of the year

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Women's organizations have been critical in sustaining Israel as a community, says University of Toronto professor Janice Gross Stein.

Janice Stein

"It is striking to me to see the role that women have played during periods of extraordinary stress," she said at a recent Na'amat Canada dinner honouring her as the 2003 Woman of the Year.

Stein, the Belzberg Professor of Conflict Management in U of T's department of political science and the director of its Munk Centre for International Studies, is also chair of the research advisory board to the Minister of Foreign Affairs and chair of the advisory board to the Canadian Centre for Foreign Policy Development.

She said that women in Israel are often the first to respond after an emergency. "Organizations such as Na'amat supplement social services by providing support for families, and maintaining community based institutions."

From the early beginnings of the state, she said, Israel has had this enormous advantage, which is why it can sustain itself even during war.

"When we compare tanks and guns, Israel does not have a great advantage, but when we compare social service institutions it has a huge advantage over its neighbours, and that is what makes the critical difference."

Women's organizations are developing in Arab countries, she said, and they are now taking on an essential role.

"When hospitals are inaccessible, women are providing health care, and they are going into high schools to teach non-violence as a way to solve problems."

When the bombs stop and young men choose to live for their state, and when the "broad middle class in both societies reclaim political power, I think that the history of this period will be rewritten.

"The important and largely untold story of women, and what they are doing in Israel and in Palestine [will be told]. These women are sustaining their societies in the midst of crippling, crushing violence.

"Eventually, it will be these women that reach across the divide and allow us to write a different story," she said.

Halifax shul marks its 50th anniversary

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — Six months of 50th anniversary celebrations of Shaar Shalom Synagogue opened with a stirring concert by the shul's choir in Halifax and will culminate with a gala dinner in November.

In the next several months, the Conservative congregation will honour its founding members and will hold a kosher wine tasting, a Jewish film festival co-ordinated with the Atlantic Jewish Council, a November concert of music by composers who died in the Holocaust and several Shabbat services, all to mark its golden anniversary.

"Our goal is to celebrate 50 years of Shaar Shalom as a prelude to the future rather than a tribute to the past," said congregation president Darrell Pink.

"By running special Shabbat services, we're trying to bring people to the synagogue for events other than Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur or special occasions," anniversary co-coordinator Peggy Walt said.

The congregation was founded in 1953, when a group of about 30 families, who had been members of the Orthodox Baron de Hirsch Synagogue, the only shul in Halifax at the time, decided a new approach to prayer was needed.

Suggestions by Rabbi Stanley Kessler, the Conservative-trained spiritual leader of Baron de Hirsch, that they seek something different, that men and women could sit together and that more of the service could be conducted in English caught on with the group, recalled founding Shaar Shalom member Peter Herschorn.

The first Shaar Shalom services were held in church basements. Hebrew school was conducted in private homes until a synagogue building was completed in 1955.

"It was a tremendously enthusiastic congregation," said Florrie Fineberg, who moved from Montreal after marrying congregant Leonard Fineberg.

She taught music to the Hebrew school children for eight years and led the choir.

"Every month, a fundraising project, a dance, tea or sale was going on. We had a men's club, a women's league and the congregation grew. Today we have about 150 family and single members."

Florrie Fineberg says the synagogue has been the focal point of her life.

"I'm not religious, but Judaism is in my heart. The Shaar has been like a family to me. Many Haligonians had mates who came from away. We were able to meet and become good friends with people from Montreal, Toronto and the West who I would never have met otherwise."

Other anniversary projects include a cookbook of all recipes prepared in the shul kitchen, compiled by Marianne Ferguson, a display of all kippot from bar and bat mitzvot and weddings held in the synagogue, and a musical archives, including a catalogue of all performances by the synagogue choir in 50 years, as well as recordings of some services and videos of shul musicals.

Vancouver Jewish leader dies at 78

By PETER CAULFIELD
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — Leon Kahn, a pillar of the Jewish community here, died of a heart attack on June 8 at his west-side home. He was 78.

A native of Poland, Kahn spent World War II as a partisan fighting the Nazis. In 1948, he left Europe and moved to Vancouver, where he became a successful real estate developer. Kahn was well-known in the Lower Mainland as a generous philanthropist, a sensitive Holocaust educator and a respected leader of the Jewish community.

Kahn was born Leon Kaganowicz in 1925 in Eisiskes, Poland, a small town near present-day Vilnius, Lithuania. In 1941, with the Nazis in hot pursuit, Kahn and three other members of the Kaganowicz family fled from their home and ran to the nearby forest.

Kahn, along with his father, brother and sister, joined the partisans and conducted hit-and-run attacks on the Nazis. One by one, Kahn lost his family. His sister was outrun by an enemy pursuer and bayoneted. His father was shot dead with a dumdum bullet, and his brother was killed in an ambush. Kahn's wartime experiences were recorded in No Time To Mourn, which he wrote and self-published after the war.

In 1945, Kahn was placed in a displaced persons' camp in Austria. Eager to leave Europe, he tried to get into the United States. Rejected by Uncle Sam, he applied to and was accepted by Canada in 1948. After settling in Vancouver, he worked his way up to become head of the construction division of Block Brothers Real Estate. Later Kahn established his own real estate development company.

Kahn's death was "a terrible loss to my family and to the Jewish community. He was very precious to us," said Rita Akselrod, a Holocaust survivor from Romania who has known Kahn since 1948, when she met him in the DP camp in Salzburg.

Kahn soon left the camp and emigrated to Vancouver.

Rabbi Avi Baumol, spiritual leader of Congregation Schara Tzedeck, said he first met Kahn in the synagogue at morning services on the rabbi's first day five years ago. "We started studying together every day before services and we developed a beautiful relationship."

Kahn was "a giant among men," the rabbi said. "But what was remarkable about him was his approachability – he was no recluse, no hermit; he was there, in the open, for all to connect, for anyone to engage."

Dina Wachtel, Combined Jewish Appeal campaign director and Keren Hayesod Israel emissary, knew Leon Kahn for five years.

"Leon was successful in Vancouver, but he never forgot where he came from," Wachtel said. "He had great feeling for Israel and the importance of maintaining it. And he understood that people had to be reminded of the Holocaust."

'We have to...embrace a wake-up within the Jewish community'

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

A true leader needs to have a broad perspective and be a little bit crazy, says Gil Troy, a professor of American history at McGill University.

"You don't want to be normal in a society that says 'Don't make waves' and that closes its eyes to the biggest moral challenge of [the] times," he said at the recent fourth annual Town Hall Meeting sponsored by The Canadian Jewish News.

Troy, author of Why I Am a Zionist: Israel, Jewish Identity and the Challenges of Today, gave a lecture titled "In Times of Crisis: the Proper Models of Leadership."

He told the more than 100 people at the meeting that selfishness is the first part of the current crisis.

"Sept. 11 was a wake-up call to the broader world, [but not] to enough people north of the American border. People could see how evil terror could be.

"Unfortunately, for too many people, the wake-up calls only occur the day after the terrorist attack is near [them]. Shame on us all."

These days, he said, anyone who stands up and speaks against terrorism is perceived to be a right-winger, "and I reject that characterization.

"We who are on the left have to get up and say that terror is an affront to us as liberals. Terror goes against every fundamental principle – liberty, equality, respect for individuals, and tolerance."

The crisis is most compelling when it touches us close to home, he said, "but the mark of a true liberal, of a true human being, should be to look at the world and ask 'What can I do?'

"I don't understand this pacifism that has degenerated into passivity. Eli Wiesel called neutrality a sin that violates everything we should be standing for."

Troy said he has seen great moments in the Jewish community, but added he doesn't see enough Jews inconveniencing themselves. "We have to be bold and honest in order to embrace a wake-up within the Jewish community.

"The 30- and 40-year-olds who are in the high productive time of their lives are busy with kids and careers, and they are not carving out the time to be a little inconvenienced.

"They are not carving out time to have that uncomfortable conversation with their colleagues at work. They are not choosing to give up on the Disneyland vacation and go to Israel, or to send Israel money."

The Jewish community needs to be more self-critical, and it must become more assertive, positive and creative, he said.

"We have to step back, and not let the current crisis be defined as a problem that has been imposed on us by the ideologues and the haters of the Middle East. We have to critique the broader Jewish community."

To support Israel, he said, does not mean to support every policy.

"Why do we box ourselves in a corner where we have to see Israel as perfect? We have to acknowledge the complexity and imperfection. Self-critique does not mean Israel does not have the right to exist. We have to move beyond that."

Gil Troy at the Town Hall Meeting, sponsored by The CJN.

Troy said that at a recent focus group he led for the Bronfman Jewish Education Centre in Montreal, he asked 15 university students how and what they learned about Israel, and how those lessons could have been improved, he said.

"These students had a mixed message that was very important to the community. The first message was to not sugar coat. Don't ignore the dilemma, but teach the conflict and crisis. Otherwise, kids from the finest Jewish day schools will have a superficial understanding of the situation."

But the students also recommended celebrating Jewish culture and Jewish heroes. "Especially in times of crisis, let's not forget to celebrate, and let's not forget to enjoy."

We have to ask what kind of Jewish lessons are being learned, he said.

"I see a moral crisis in so many parts of the community. In Toronto, [people] are struggling with the issue of having to be rich to attend a Jewish day school. If a community does not have enough subsidies so that its Jewish professionals can afford to send their kids to Jewish day schools, then we have a problem.

"There is enough wealth in the Jewish world so that it does not have to be either/or. We're not in the medieval Jewish world where we have to make a choice between building new synagogues and freeing hostages."

Our priorities are upside down, Troy said. "Too many synagogues are known as centres of fashion rather than centres of moral excellence, and too many schools are known as centres of materialism rather than centres of menschlichkeit."

There are also elements of crisis in the community beyond consumerism, he said. "There is the problem of disunity, and the way we speak about each other. Orthodox Jews call secular Jews 'goyim' and secular Jews spit out the word 'Orthodox' like a curse."

We are struggling with the challenge of having too much freedom, Troy said, including the freedom of giving up who we are. "Being Jewish is a voluntary choice we have to embrace. We have to make Judaism a little more appealing."

He said that we should all learn a lesson from one girl in Israel who decided after a pizzeria bombing that she felt uncomfortable about having a bat mitzvah party.

She didn't want to celebrate while other kids her age were in the hospital, so she spent her bat mitzvah visiting them, and with the help of friends started One Family, an organization that donates money, time and services to victims of terror and their families, Troy said.

"That is a response. By helping Israel, we are not just responding to 'poor' Israel, we are doing something about our own communal problems.

"We could create an alternative social pressure for goodness – such as giving charity instead of birthday presents – that would get us out of this rut," Troy said.

"We have had so many wake-up calls that we know what to do. We need the willingness and social pressure to get up and do it."

KESHER helps Canadian students connect with Argentine Jews

By GILLIAN LINDZON
Special to The CJN

Two of my greatest pleasures are volunteer work and travel. Having the opportunity to combine the two was an ideal way to spend two weeks of my summer vacation. Along with 19 American university students, I went to Argentina late last month to assist its Jewish community in recovering from the economic crisis.

We began working at the Wolfsohn building. We repaired holes in the floor, put up wallpaper and painted the stairwell, doorways and pipes, often adding our own personal touches. The Wolfsohn building is a former Jewish day school that was closed down due to the financial crisis, and is now being remodelled (helped by KESHER students) as the new Netzer building. It will house Netzer's after-school educational activities for children of all ages, who will come to play and learn every Shabbat.

The trip was sponsored by KESHER, a college education department of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations (UAHC) on the pilot program of Argentine ambassadors. The organization serves several different constituencies, including Reform college students, UAHC congregations and their youth committees, campus Hillel foundations and high school students exploring Jewish life on campus. KESHER offered the opportunity to work closely with members of Netzer (a worldwide progressive/Reform Zionist youth movement) and members of the Buenos Aires community.

The Hebrew word "kesher" means "connection." That is exactly what we formed: a strong bond with the Argentine Jewish community. We departed with the intention of taking part in social action programming and learning about the current situation of Jews in Argentina. But this trip touched me emotionally and religiously in a way I could have never anticipated.

As we worked, we often spoke of the children whom we were helping. Although we did what was considered work, we sang, danced and ate Argentine treats to keep our spirits high. Knowing that the children would be so appreciative and excited about the vast improvements made to their run-down building made this a most rewarding experience.

We also worked on two other main projects, one at the NCI/Temple Emanuel Social Action Center and the other at the Arlene Fern Community School. At the social action centre, we worked with local volunteers to make and serve meals to members of the community who could no longer afford to buy food.

At the Arlene Fern Community School, a progressive Jewish day school in Buenos Aires, we split up and went into different classrooms to interact with the students, learning about their curricula, hobbies and families. The children welcomed us with a bombardment of questions about our lives at home and gave us hugs and kisses. They were adorable with their twinkling eyes, freckles and enormous smiles.

The Jewish community in Buenos Aires embraced us. While we were at synagogue on our first Saturday, a girl in the community had her bat mitzvah. Unbeknownst to us, we were called upon for an aliyah, which was not only an honour, but a sign that they regarded us as family.

The Netzer students, ranging in age from five to 24, treated us as if we had been their friends forever, despite the obvious language barrier and our different cultural backgrounds. We spent a lot of time with them. Their dedication to the Jewish community in Buenos Aires is absolutely remarkable and unprecedented by any standard I have ever seen or even heard about. Their kindness toward the children and ruach for their movement inspired hope. Forming a circle, holding their hands both Saturday nights during the Havdalah service and singing Hatikvah, brought tears to my eyes. I hoped that somehow, someday, Jews everywhere will overcome their hardships with the help of one another.

One of the trip's highlights was when we split off into small groups and had dinner at one of our Netzer friend's homes. It was a feast: there were six different kinds of steaks, several vegetarian options and four tubs of ice cream for dessert. Despite language barriers with the parents and siblings, we were able to carry on intense conversations with our Netzer friend translating every word.

We learned about Argentina, the economic crisis, the Jewish community in Buenos Aires, and I think we learned quite a bit about ourselves. One thing for sure is that good friends can be made in a matter of days and strangers can feel like family after only a short while. I walked away from this experience with 19 new friends in the United States and a place to call home in Buenos Aires. I have learned that by working together, tikkun olam is possible and the efforts of the international Jewish community are limitless.

Gillian Lindzon has just finished her second year at the University of Western Ontario in the faculty of health sciences.

Hillel wins right to appeal case against CSU

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

Concordia Hillel has been granted leave to appeal the suspension of its lawsuit against the Concordia Student Union (CSU) and Concordia University. The appeal is to be heard Oct. 10.

Quebec Court of Appeal judge Marc Beauregard's decision to allow the appeal suspends the April 24 ruling by Superior Court judge Francois Belanger that said the dispute between Hillel and the CSU should be dealt with internally by the university.

Hillel's lawyer Michael Bergman said he was "very happy" the appeal will be heard.

Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), which supports Hillel's case, will have intervener status in the appeal, as will the Jewish Alliance Against the Occupation (JAAO), a group opposed to Israel's military presence in the West Bank and Gaza and supports the CSU.

Bergman tried unsuccessfully to appeal JAAO's intervention, which was granted by Belanger. Beauregard ruled on a "technicality," according to Bergman, that an appeal of intervener status has never been granted in jurisprudence going back to 1963.

-את כבר לא ילדה.
-אתם מאוד תתאימו, גם הוא כזה שָלוּק, לא מגולח.
-מתי אני אראה כבר נכדים?
-בסוף את תישארי לבד עם הכלב.
-יש לי להכיר לך מישהו.

Violence in West Bank, despite pullout and ceasefire

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — A Bulgarian construction worker was killed Monday in a shooting attack near the northern West Bank town of Jenin, just a day after the three main Palestinian groups declared a ceasefire.

The worker was the first fatality since Fatah, Hamas and Islamic Jihad announced the cessation of attacks on Israelis.

The Al Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades, a group associated with Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat's Fatah party, claimed responsibility for the attack.

A statement from the group, published by the Associated Press, said: "We do not agree with the ceasefire. This is our first action. This is the beginning."

Also on Monday, Israeli and Palestinian officials finalized details for the withdrawal of Israeli Defence Forces troops from the West Bank city of Bethlehem, which was to begin Wednesday.

"We met Israeli security officials in Jerusalem today and agreed Israeli troops will pull out from Bethlehem on Wednesday," said Mohammed Dahlan, the Palestinian minister in charge of security affairs, who negotiated the pullout with Maj.-Gen. Amos Gilad, the IDF coordinator of government activities in the territories.

Taking a tough stance, Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom told the Knesset Foreign Affairs and Defence Committee on Monday: "The ceasefire agreement was not concluded with Israel. It was attained between the Palestinian Authority and the extremist terrorist elements. Since we are not a party to it, its terms do not matter to us."

According to Shalom, "We see eye-to-eye with the Americans on this: The first stage of the road map will only be carried out if the Palestinians dismantle the infrastructure of terrorism, arrest wanted men, confiscate weapons and halt incitement."

Earlier Monday, PA police forces took over security responsibility for the Gaza Strip's main highway artery from the Erez entry crossing in the north to Khan Yunis in the south.

The main north-south highway stretch, which had been closed to Palestinian motorists, was opened from Netzarim Junction to the Gush Katif intersection, two sites of frequent violence in the past.

Following an overnight pull-out from a northern area of Gaza, IDF tanks withdrew and bulldozers removed sand and cement barriers from the road and handed it over, aside for one army checkpoint outside the isolated settlement of Kfar Darom. A bypass road was opened to allow Palestinian motorists to get around Kfar Darom without hindrance. Gaza police hoisted a Palestinian flag over a makeshift outpost along the road.

Israel pulled back its troops after Palestinian militant groups on Sunday declared a three-month suspension of attacks on Israelis in support of the road map.

Asked if Kassam rocket attacks against western Negev towns and kibbutzim would resume despite the ceasefire, senior Gaza PA official Sufyan Abu Zaydeh told Army Radio on Monday: "I can say with 100 per cent certainty, that there will be no Kassams, no rockets, nothing. The Palestinian police will do the job as it should be done."

But U.S. officials said a truce was no substitute for taking on militants.

"Anything that reduces violence is a step in the right direction," said White House spokeswoman Ashley Snee, but added "terrorist infrastructures" must be dismantled under the plan.

Report calls for justice

In announcing release of the report, honorary JJAC chair and Mount Royal Liberal MP Irwin Cotler charged Arab governments with "a pattern of ethnic cleansing" and "criminal conspiracy" in forcing their Jewish populations to flee.

Speaking at a news conference in New York marking release of the report, Cotler said, "This campaign is about truth, justice and reconciliation; we must return the history of Jews from Arab countries to the narrative of the Mideast from which it was expunged."

"Confronting the reality is as important as getting compensation," said Matas, who also serves as vice-president of the Canadian section of the International Commission of Jurists.

The reality as presented in the report paints a disturbing picture of a broad range of Arab states enacting restrictive legislation, fomenting mob violence and, finally, forcing Jews to depart.

"The status of Jews in Arab countries changed dramatically immediately before and after the first Arab-Israeli war of 1948-49," the report states. "By way of example, in Syria, as a result of anti-Jewish pogroms that erupted in Aleppo in 1947, 7,000 of the town's 10,000 Jews fled in terror. In Iraq, 'Zionism' became a capital crime. More than 70 Jews were killed by bombs in the Jewish quarter of Cairo between June and November 1948. After the French left Algeria, the authorities issued a variety of anti-Jewish decrees, prompting nearly all of the 160,000 Jews to flee the country. After the United Nations partition vote, Muslim rioters engaged in a bloody pogrom in Aden and Yemen, which killed 82 Jews. Varying numbers of Jews fled from 10 Arab countries, becoming refugees in a region overwhelmingly hostile to Jews. In virtually all cases, as Jews left the country, individual and communal properties were confiscated without compensation."

Of 800,000 Jewish refugees between 1948 and 1972, 586,000 settled in Israel. The report says, "There exists a moral imperative to ensure that justice for Jews from Arab countries assumes its rightful place on the international political and judicial agenda and that their rights be secured as a matter of law and equity."

The issue has been largely ignored by the international community, but there have been exceptions, Matas said. The UN High Commission for Refugees lobbied on behalf of Egyptian Jews form 1957-67, he said, leaving behind "a huge paper trail" but very few successful compensation claims.

Matas said the rights of Jewish refugees have been recognized in various international treaties and agreements. UN Resolution 242, which contemplates Israeli withdrawals from seized territories in exchange for peace, includes a provision for redress for refugees. The resolution does not indicate who qualifies as a refugee although debate at the time indicated it would include Jews fleeing Arab lands.

Matas said a number of remedies could be implemented to satisfy Jewish claims, ranging from continuation of the efforts made by the UN High Commissioner for Refugees, to legal claims under the Refugee Convention in 1951, to creation of an international fund that would be part of a comprehensive Arab-Israel settlement.

He was particularly critical of Canada's role as chair of the Refugee Working Group, established following the 1991 multi-party Madrid Peace Conference. Canada has ignored the issue, arguing it would complicate the situation, Matas said.

Foreign Affairs spokesperson Marie-Christine Lilkoff said the question of Palestinian refugees had been identified as a central issue of the peace process.

"Since they do not impinge directly on Israeli-Palestinian situation, the claims of Jewish refugees from Arab countries should be resolved between the countries concerned," she said.

In other developments, the British House of Lords was scheduled to hold public hearings earlier this week, after The CJN went to press, on the rights of Jews from Arab countries. The hearings were to examine the response of the British government to the plight of Jewish refugees who fled Egypt in the mid-1950s. International legal experts and British and French Jewish community leaders were to participate in the proceedings.

At the same time, a formal delegation was to present Baroness Symons of Vernham Dean, the British Minister of State for Middle East Affairs, with a copy of the report.

Rice asks Sharon to 'rethink' fence route

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — U.S. National Security Adviser Condoleezza Rice asked Prime Minister Ariel Sharon on Sunday to reconsider with "greater sensitivity" the planned route of the separation fence between Israel and the West Bank.

Sharon agreed to the request, but the issue was later discussed by Rice and members of the security cabinet at a meeting in Jerusalem. The issue was raised by Finance Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, who said the fence was necessary as a result of the large number of terror alerts, as well as to Israel's pro-active operations.

"Two hundred and fifty Palestinian suicide bombers have entered Israel from the West Bank," Netanyahu said, "but not one from Gaza. Building the fence is not a political move, it is a security move."

Education Minister Limor Livnat said the fence is only a temporary solution, and that emphasis must be placed on the demand that the Palestinians rein in terror.

Rice told Sharon the United States sees construction of the fence as highly problematic, since the Palestinians see Israel using it to determine political borders and annex Palestinian territory. Even if the fence is a security issue, she said, it is perceived as being political.

Sharon said Israel would not compromise on the security of the country and its citizens, and the fence fulfils a vital security need, even if Israel and the United States disagree on its necessity.

In all her meetings, Rice stressed that the United States is demanding that the PA disarm Hamas and all the other terror groups, and that the administration remains firm in its support of Israel.

Her talks began with a three-way meeting with Palestinian Finance Minister Salam Fayyad and Sharon's bureau chief, Dov Weisglass. Rice said in order to suffocate Hamas, the Palestinian Authority (PA) must develop an alternative to the welfare system Hamas has established.

The United States is interested in investing large sums of money in projects that would give the Palestinians an immediate sense that their situation is improving, Rice said. She asked the Palestinians to make a proposal to the United States, and she asked Israel to help implement the projects.

She recognized Israel's right to fight terror, but asked Israel to give the Palestinians time, and to use restraint in its military reactions, even in areas still under IDF control. If Israel knows of a bomber on his way to carry out an attack and the PA does nothing to stop him, she said, then Israel has the right and the duty to act. But she urged Israel to think twice before acting.

Sharon said Israel would track implementation of an agreement to transfer responsibility for security in the Gaza Strip, and that if the PA does not fulfil its obligations, "Israel will consider itself released of its commitments."

Ministers expressed concern about the weakness of Palestinian Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas in his dealings with Yasser Arafat, a problem Rice said she recognizes. She said it is very important for Abbas to hold real power, and that both Israel and the United States should help him.

Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom told Rice that in general, he supports the Gaza accord, but that for the road map to succeed, Abbas and PA Security Minister Mohammed Dahlan must act immediately to decommission illegal weapons and dismantle terrorist infrastructure.

"As of today, Israel has started to implement the road map, and the Palestinians have not," Shalom said. "They must make the strategic decision to eradicate terror."

PA newspaper insults U.S. gov't officials

By ITAMAR MARCUS

Palestinian Media Watch

A Palestinian Authority (PA) daily has published another article attacking U.S. National Security Adviser Condoleezza Rice, making her race an integral part of the story.

In an article in the June 22 issue of Al Ayyam, Rice is referred to as a "black woman" three times and a "black spinster." The article's author, who says he even considered the term "black widow" but rejected it, also uses the opportunity to highlight the race of U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell and Reverend Jesse Jackson and to categorize the wives of U.S. presidents.

"[National Security Adviser] Dr. Condolezza Rice is the most influential national security advisor in the US administration since 'Darling Henry' Kissinger... The White House has seen some women with strong personalities, such as 'the dominant' wife of president Ronald Reagan, 'the bright and the ambitious' wife of president Bill Clinton, and the 'beloved' wife of president John Kennedy. However, Condoleezza is the first lady [in rank], and the first black woman to serve in the most serious post in the White House. She is the 'president's brain,' especially with regard to the current incumbent, who is the most powerful world leader, but is one of the weakest presidents, [regarding] international political culture, to pass through the White House."

"The adviser's 'intelligence' and the 'bravery' of General Colin Powell are what have elevated this black woman and black gentleman to the highest positions ever held by a black American woman or black American man in any administration...

"In contrast to Powell, who is the 'moderate' in an extremist American administration, Rice is conspicuous by her thinking which follows the American 'New Right,' which is conservative and messianic. She is the daughter of a black clergyman, who filled her head during her childhood with stories about the Holy Land. These are vastly different from the liberal political theories espoused by the black minister Jesse Jackson, who is considered a 'friend of the Palestinians' and a supporter of the downtrodden Third World nations. He was also the first black candidate for the American presidency.

"In an exclusive interview with Yediot Acharonot at the end of last May... she spoke about her powerful spiritual impressions from her first visit to Israel in August 2000: 'There, I felt as if I had come home, in my first visit to the place. There is a deep attachment between me and Israel.'"

The article includes other insults:

"... 'Darling Henry' the Jew pretended to weep over the Israeli political leadership's 'stupidity' and 'short-sightedness'...

"Next week Ms. Rice will be visiting Israel for the second time ...in order to salvage the 'brave' and 'moderate' black [Powell] from failure by salvaging the road map..."

"...Beware this 'black spinster,' we don't want to say 'the black widow' out of respect for her femininity and her intelligence."

• Israel arrested 130 Palestinians in the West Bank, mainly in Hebron and Nablus. Most belong to Hamas and are suspects in recent terror attacks.

• Four Palestinians were killed in Gaza when a bomb they were planting blew up prematurely, Palestinian witnesses said. They were said to be part of a Fatah-linked militia.

June 24

• Five leaders of Israel's Islamic Movement, including the head of its northern branch and the mayor of the Israeli-Arab town of Umm el-Fahm, were charged with belonging to a terror group, money laundering and contact with foreign agents. They allegedly channelled funds from Hamas-linked charities abroad to Hamas-linked groups in the West Bank and Gaza, but weren't charged with involvement in terror or providing money for attacks.

June 25

• Israel killed two Hamas gunmen in a firefight in northern Gaza as they were trying to plant a bomb along the security fence. Israel also killed two Palestinians and injured 16 in a helicopter strike in Gaza aimed at a Hamas cell preparing to launch rockets at the Jewish state.

• Soldiers removed two tents at an outpost near Hebron. Settlers said they put up two other outposts overnight.

June 26

• A Palestinian youth fatally shot an Israeli phone company worker in the northern Arab town Baqa el-Gharbiyeh, near the West Bank. A Fatah-linked militia claimed responsibility.

June 27

• Hamas founder Sheikh Ahmed Yassin said the group has decided to suspend attacks on Israel and that it would formally declare its position in the coming days.

U.S. trying to stop Iran's nuclear weapons program

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

The debate over Iran's pursuit of nuclear weapons, which began in earnest several years ago, has intensified since the U.S. occupation of Iraq.

In recent months, the United States has drawn attention to the topic by calling for intrusive international inspections of Iran's budding nuclear facilities and by redoubling its efforts to persuade Russia to end its nuclear co-operation with Iran.

And in a sharp warning, U.S. President George W. Bush has said he and other world leaders will not tolerate a nuclear-armed Iran.

By all accounts, Iran – an Islamic country that questions Israel's existence and actively supports Hamas and Hezbollah – is dangerously close to acquiring a nuclear arsenal: Iran has learned how to produce its own nuclear bomb fuel.

"The assessment is that Iran does have a very active program and is likely to have nuclear weapons in a relatively short period of time," U.S. Secretary of Defence Donald Rumsfeld said last month.

According to American intelligence agencies, Iran will join the nuclear club by the end of the decade. Israel's foreign minister, Silvan Shalom, believes that Iran is within two years of that objective.

But whatever the timeline, the consensus is that Iran has embarked on a serious quest to become the second Muslim nation after Pakistan to be a nuclear power.

Iran, which has a plentiful supply of oil and gas, claims its nuclear program is peaceful and designed to offset a future domestic energy shortage.

But critics contend that Iran is developing nuclear weapons under the guise of a civilian nuclear program.

Iran's foray into nuclear technology began in 1957 under the pro-American Pahlavi monarchy, which had fruitful political, economic and military relations with Israel.

The United States, Israel and West Germany contributed significantly to Iran's nuclear program, which was suspended in the wake of the 1979 Islamic revolution.

Iran resumed the program in the 1990s, when Russia agreed to complete the construction of a 1,000-mega-watt light water reactor at the Persian Gulf port of Bushehr.

Apart from Bushehr, the program consists of a uranium enrichment plants in Natanz and Kalaye.

Thanks to its advanced long-range missiles, Iran possesses the means to deliver a nuclear weapon. The Shahab 3 missile, with a range of about 1,300 kilometres, can theoretically reach Israel. The estimated range of the Shahab 4 is 2,000 kilometres.

These missiles were reportedly developed with the help of China, North Korea and, possibly, disaffected scientists from the former Soviet Union.

In sharp contrast to the manner in which it handled the issue of Iraq's weapons of mass destruction, the Bush administration is trying to resolve the Iranian problem through diplomacy rather than military force. Washington hopes that the International Atomic Energy Agency, as well as Russia, can rein in Iran.

Last February, the director of the IAEA, Mohammed El-Baradei, visited Bushehr. His mission was to convince Iran to accept stricter supervision of its nuclear program.

But El-Baradei appears to have failed. Last month, he issued a report in which he accused Iran of not being forthcoming about its nuclear activities.

Although Iran rejected a call for wider inspections, the Iranian government expressed a willingness to co-operate more actively with the IAEA.

In the meantime, the United States and its allies are pressing Russian President Vladimir Putin to downgrade nuclear ties with Iran.

Clearly dissatisfied with Iranian President Mohammad Khatami's bland assurance to Putin that Iran has no intention of building nuclear weapons, the Bush administration has exerted additional pressure on Moscow to suspend exports of nuclear fuel to Iran until Tehran meets the demands of the IAEA.

Citing Israel's nuclear program, Iran complains of being unfairly singled out for special treatment. Israel, which denies having a nuclear capability, maintains it will not officially address the subject until it is at peace with all its Muslim neighbours. Washington supports Israel's policy, saying the issue should not be opened as long as the Arab-Israeli dispute festers.

Novelist Leon Uris gave Jewish history wide appeal

By PETER EPHROSS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Leon Uris wasn't a critic's darling. But for millions of readers, he was an entrée into modern Jewish history.

Uris' books "appeal to people who want a good read," said Bonnie Lyons, a professor of English at the University of Texas-San Antonio.

Uris, who died on June 21 in New York of renal failure at the age of 78, became famous for his 600-page novel Exodus, about the Jewish struggle to establish the State of Israel after World War II.

Through his works, people could develop a sympathy for Israel and Jewish history, said Lyons, who has written widely on American Jewish literature.

Uris was known for books that were long and obsessively researched – and, once they landed on the bookshelves, were obsessively read.

Leon Marcus Uris was born on Aug. 3, 1924, in Baltimore. His parents were immigrants from the Russian Empire. His father had spent a year in British Mandate Palestine before moving to the United States, and derived his surname, Uris, from Yerushalmi, meaning Jerusalemite, according to The New York Times.

It is no coincidence that the story of European immigrants making their way to what was then Palestine and establishing the State of Israel was the basis of Exodus.

By using the story of the Jewish underground fighters trying to smuggle Jews into British Mandate Palestine, Uris made Jewish history and Zionism of the late 19th and early 20th centuries accessible to many.

"The mythic Israel he presented is still the mythic Israel in the heads of many American Jews," said Sanford Pinsker, the Shadek professor of humanities at Franklin and Marshall College in Lancaster, Penn.

Uris was not well-regarded by critics, many of whom considered his writing crude and simple.

People who think Saul Bellow, Bernard Malamud and Cynthia Ozick are major Jewish writers "would say [Uris] was just a popular writer," Lyons said. "He tells a good story, but he's not of lasting literary value."

In the world of American Jewish fiction, Uris is likely to be remembered as a step below Chaim Potok, perhaps on a par with Herman Wouk.

But readers around the world didn't seem to care. Exodus was translated into dozens of languages and even smuggled into Communist Eastern Europe.

"Exodus has been the bible of the Jewish dissident movement in Russia. It's referred to as 'The Book,'" he once told the Associated Press.

It later was made into a movie by Otto Preminger.

After Exodus, Uris continued to explore Jewish themes.

He travelled across eastern Europe to collect material for Mila 18, a novel about the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising. It proved so successful that Joseph Heller reportedly decided to change the name of his novel from Catch-18 to Catch-22.

Published in 1988, Mitla Pass takes place in Israel during the events that led up to the Suez War in 1956, and traces the ancestry of journalist Gideon Zadok back to the 1880s.

Among Uris' other novels were Trinity, about Ireland's struggle for independence, and QB VII, a fictionalized account of a lawsuit filed against Uris by a Polish doctor who had been called a war criminal in Exodus.

Uris, who grew up in Norfolk, Va., once said, "I used to think of myself as a very sad little Jewish boy, undersized, asthmatic."

His father was a storekeeper whom Uris remembered as a failure, which the novelist said motivated him to succeed.

"I think I can say that from earliest memory I was determined not to be a failure," he said.

Uris quit high school soon after the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor and joined the Marines. He served as a radio operator in the campaigns at Guadalcanal and Tarawa.

His last book, O'Hara's Choice, a love story involving the history of the Marines, is slated to be published in October.

Uris was married three times and had five children.

Lemonade

Fresh-squeezed lemonade! Only 35 cents! Refills 25 cents! Ari looked dejectedly at his sign, wiping his forehead. It seemed that nobody was driving by today. He had been in the blazing sun for over two hours, and he'd only made 95 cents! He squinted through the shimmering air looking for oncoming cars. The street was empty. *Wait, a car was coming! Maybe the driver would buy some lemonade. It was coming closer. Three blocks away, two blocks, they would definitely buy, it's so hot today...*Ari broke off in mid-thought as the car signalled and turned down a side street.

Aaaaaaaaaaaugh! Ari felt like screaming. "Why am I wasting my time?" he muttered to himself, adjusting the small fan on the table in front of him. He tasted a cup of lemonade. It wasn't ice cold anymore. He would have to get more ice.

"Esti!" he yelled. "I need more ice!" A minute later, the door to his house opened, and his sister appeared, holding a tray of ice.

"Ari, how much did you make so far?" she asked.

"Uh, 95 cents." he replied.

"That's it?" said Esti, pouring the ice cubes into the pitcher on the table. "Gosh, that's less than 50 cents an hour. Why didn't you put up more signs around the neighbourhood?"

"I did! I put up more than 10 signs! It's just that NO ONE'S INTERESTED!"

"So come inside already. It's so hot out here."

"I think I will...in another few minutes. I want to make at least a dollar today."

"OK, but you might be outside the whole afternoon," said Esti, taking the empty ice cube tray and going back inside.

A dollar! That's how little I'm settling for! thought Ari angrily. I was planning on making over 10! I even looked forward to baking my brain out here in the sun! Why am I wasting my time?

Again he futilely scanned the street. A car was coming! It passed him without even slowing down. Forget it. I'm going inside...Hey! Who's that? An old woman was walking down the street. I thought I was the only person stupid enough to be outside today. She must be boiling hot. There's no way she'll pass my stand without buying lemonade!

But as the woman got closer, Ari realized she probably didn't have enough money to buy even one cup. Her dress was torn and ragged, her face was creased and wrinkled, and she seemed bent under some terrible burden.

"Good afternoon, young man," she said faintly, slowly. "Could I have a cup of lemonade?"

"Uh, it's thirty five cents," said Ari, hopefully. But the old woman shook her head sadly. Reaching into her pockets, she produced one, two...three cents.

"This is all I have."

Oh, great. She wants free lemonade. But then Ari felt a wave of compassion. All she has is three cents — she has even less money than I do!

Ari remembered what he had learned about the importance of tzedakah, charity. About what a great mitzvah it was. All right, fine. I'll give her a cup. Ari reached for the pitcher, scowling. Wait! Rabbi Perlow said when you give charity to someone, you shouldn't make them feel bad. You should give with a smile...

"Of course you can have a cup," said Ari, forcing himself to smile as he poured her some lemonade. She drank it hurriedly, thirstily.

"Would you like another cup?" He actually meant it this time.

"Oh, thank you..." she broke off, not knowing his name.

"Ari." It was strange how easy it was pouring that second cup. I guess being nice gets easier the more you do it. He handed her the cup with a smile — not a fake one, a genuine one.

"Ari," said a voice behind him. He jumped, and quickly turned around.

A man stood there. Ari must have been too busy with the old lady to notice him park his car and come out.

"That was very kind of you," he said. "I think I'll pay you for what she bought."

"No," said Ari, surprising even himself. "Uh, no thanks." He couldn't explain it, but he wanted to keep the mitzvah for himself, and he felt that taking money for it would diminish it.

The man seemed somewhat surprised. "Well, in that case," he smiled, "how about some lemonade for me and my sons?" He turned to his car, called out, "Boys!" and five boys came piling out. "We've been playing baseball all day, and we're mighty thirsty. So we'll take six cups and some refills too."

He pulled out a $10 dollar bill and gave it to Ari. "I'm not sure how much we'll need, but this should cover it. Keep the change!"

Governments, hospitals must work together: Mapa

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Government and hospitals must create "a culture of partnership" in which both work together for the good of the community, says Joseph Mapa, president and CEO of Toronto's Mount Sinai Hospital.

Such a model would be a "win-win situation" for everybody, he said.

Joseph Mapa

To this end, Mapa and Peggy Leatt, the chair of department of health policy and administration at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill's school of public health, have co-edited Government Relations in the Health Care Industry (Praeger, 2003), a book of essays by scholars, practitioners and policymakers that its publisher says aims "to provide compelling reasons why the development and maintenance of effective government relations in the health care industry must be a top priority."

Mapa is an assistant professor in the department of health policy, management and evaluation at the University of Toronto's faculty of medicine. He also holds an MBA from U of T and has written many articles and three books.

Although he has been at Mount Sinai for more than 20 years, serving as executive assistant to former president and CEO Jerry Turner and then as chief operating officer, he has only been in his current position for two years. In that short time, he has had to contend with both SARS and last winter's Norwalk stomach virus.

In both cases, Mapa has put hospital resources and staff in the forefront of the medical system's response. Indeed, Donald Low, the hospital's chief of microbiology, has been a prominent spokesperson in the current SARS crisis.

And, he noted, "we have already been contacted by the government about dealing with West Nile virus."

This community involvement is one way Mount Sinai is trying to overcome problems caused by government restructuring of healthcare services, Mapa said in an interview.

"Hospitals were targeted [by government cost-cutting] because, taking up a large proportion of the provincial budget, it is an obvious object to go after," he said.

The problem with that, he said, is that "you can't have it both ways. Because the health-care system is regulated, hospitals are obligated to supply whatever is needed." Demand for services is "surging," while funds to meet it are declining, Mapa said.

This situation also affects fundraising from non-governmental sources, he said. The reality is that "the more government funding that a hospital gets, the more the community will help," he said.

The most important tool in attracting government support, Mapa said, is to make sure an institution is the best at what it does – for instance, the best at obstetrics or the best at trauma care.

This calls for what Mapa terms "evidence-based advocacy," in which hospitals promote their strengths.

These principles apply equally in both the United States and Canada, Mapa said, despite the lack of a government-funded universal health plan south of the border.

A book for kids who have lost a sibling

By honouring and remembering a child who died, you can learn to cope with your pain and bring peace to your heart and soul, says Robyn Posen Young.

This is not just an academic statement for Young, who lost her daughter, Samantha nearly seven years ago. Samantha died from a tumour of the brain stem at age 5½.

Upset that there was no effective palliative care available for children at the time, Young decided to write a book to help children and their parents and siblings deal with the trauma.

Samantha's Unicorn appeared last year, published by the Temmy Latner Centre for Palliative Care at Toronto's Mount Sinai hospital.

It told the story of a little girl who was very ill. One day, she met a unicorn that took her for "a ride above the rainbow," where "all of the children were healthy. They could all walk, talk, eat, drink and play."

The book, designed for children, was written in simple language and used brilliant colours to depict the kind of things that happen to kids in a hospital, and to show that it is perfectly normal to feel scared about the experience.

The unicorn, Samantha's favourite creature, also plays a part in the second book in the series, Jamie's Rainbow, by the same author, illustrator (Merridy Kotler) and publisher.

This book was written for the siblings of a child who died. Jamie, Samantha's sister, was actually born after Samantha died, although in the book she knew her sister.

Young said it was important to write a second book "to show that life keeps going, and we can still be happy."

She is considering writing a third book with her third child Ben as the focus, as well as a workbook for children who are ill.

But right now, Young and her family are still excited about the Mount Sinai Hospital Foundation's Unicorn Ball, which was held last month.

What started as a "little dinner" has turned into a major gala event that this year raised about $50,000 for pediatric palliative care. The hope is to make it an annual event, she said.

Both of Young's books are available at the Temmy Latner Centre for Palliative Care.

Staff Reporter

He's a self-confessed shy guy. He doesn't like the limelight. He's bespectacled, mild-mannered and slightly built. But Jeff Pinsky can make your eyes bug out, your jaw drop, and stop you in your tracks, literally at the drop of a hat. Or the flip of a coin. Or the turn of a card.

If you're into magic, whether as amateur or pro, walking into Pinsky's shop, Browser's Den of Magic (875 Eglinton Ave. W.), is as close as you can get to a kid-in-the-candy-store analogy. Tricks and ruses, age-old and brand new, jam the shelves of the small, narrow store, their bright colours vying for attention. Hundreds of how-to books, videos and DVDs are carefully racked cheek-by-jowl with magic wands, balls, cups, rings, cabinets, vanishing this and reappearing that. Throw in some classic pranks (the bloodied fake thumb, the joy buzzer, the rubber mouse) along with everything today's clown and ventriloquist might need, and you have the kind of business that even the non-practitioner can get lost in for hours.

Which is all right by the shopkeeper. Pinsky, 37 and single, bought the 1,000-square-foot store from Browser's Den founder Len Cooper in 1995 (Cooper, a taller version of Groucho Marx, died this past January at age 75). Pinsky allows, a bit sheepishly, that business has grown and is simply "good." He has set up a Web site (www.browsersden.com) and a mail-order catalogue that attracts buyers from around the world, but seems out-of-sorts when discussing the financial nuts and bolts of running the place.

"I'm here at 6 a.m. every day, updating the site, answering e-mail questions, doing paperwork," – and, he adds with a slight smile – "learning new tricks." That's 12-hour days, five, often six days a week.

But can he conjure up a fatter bottom line? "No," he says with a sigh. "It's not easy doing this. But it is a lot of fun."

How can it not be? With more than 3,000 different tricks, props, supplies, and instructional materials for sale, Browser's Den has become Magic Central in Toronto, a kind of home away from home for local magicians. Walk in almost any day, and you'll find men young and old (it's an almost exclusively male domain) gathered, cracker-barrel style, swapping tips, learning new methods or just shooting the breeze about the latest developments in the field.

"It's a meeting place for the magic scene in Toronto," says Pinsky, a York University business graduate and member of the Canadian Association of Magicians. "We also sponsor lectures, and I go to magic conventions to keep up with the latest."

Nothing up his sleeve: Browser's Den of Magic owner Jeff Pinsky (Ron Csillag photo)

About 20 per cent of his customers are professional magicians, the rest hobbyists and dabblers. His prices range from $3 for a simple disappearing ball trick, to $550 for a handmade, wooden ventriloquist's doll whose eyes move.

> 'Be natural. Hide your skill'

Pinsky was bitten by the magic bug at age eight when he learned his first trick: Making three different lengths of rope appear – presto! – as one.

Magic is more popular now than ever, he says, owing much to such mainstay acts as Penn & Teller, David Copperfield and Siegfried & Roy. The field has received a boost of late from the awe-inspiring street magic of David Blaine, whose illusory antics literally stop traffic and cause people to flee. Of course, the escapades of boy wizard Harry Potter haven't hurt either.

Magic falls into three categories, Pinsky explains: close-up, parlour tricks (before 20 to 50 people) and stage magic, performed before thousands, or millions on television. As for those tabloid TV shows that expose tricks, "they're terrible because they cheapen magic. But they're good for business."

Pinsky describes himself as "a general practitioner. Although I demonstrate magic to customers, I'm a pure hobbyist." With about 20 new items coming into the store every month, he figures he has to learn about 10 tricks a month.

"Perfecting any trick requires patience and practice. A lot of people want instant gratification. If I use the word 'practice,' sales go down."

The old stand-bys still sell well: Chinese linking rings, cups and balls. But the best-sellers are card tricks, some with ordinary decks, others with specially marked or rigged ones. A particular favourite is the Invisible Deck, in which the spectator names a card, which turns out to be the only one face down in the fanned-out deck.

Another crowd pleaser is called Scotch and Soda. In it, a coin changes colours right in the unsuspecting person's closed hand. For The CJN, Pinsky nonchalantly has the reporter write his initials on a small sticker that is fastened to the face of a card. After the customary shuffle and some snappy show-biz patter, the card with the sticker somehow winds up in his pocket.

Kids will be slack-jawed over a bit that combines nifty legerdemain with a cuddly rabbit in a top hat, who, with Pinsky's help, pulls... ah, let's not ruin it.

It all boils down to three basics: Sleight-of-hand, misdirection and psychology (Pinsky prefers the term "audience management").

"No one really likes being tricked," he says. "We're brought up to believe it's not nice to trick people. You have to make it fun and entertaining. A lot of it is theatre and misdirection. The really good close-up people hide their skills. That's the advice: Be natural. Hide your skill."

The Judeo-Christian tradition frowns on sorcery. The Book of Deuteronomy warns it is "an abomination" to be an enchanter, witch, charmer, consulter with familiar spirits, wizard or necromancer. But perhaps the most famous magician of all was Jewish: Harry Houdini, born Erich Weiss, the son of a Hungarian rabbi.

The shop is in the heart of a Jewish neighbourhood, and many of Pinsky's customers are Jewish.

"A lot of our religious customers buy juggling equipment," he points out. Perhaps it's in keeping with the old Jewish tradition of being a tummler – a prankster – the life of the party.

Pinsky, a Montreal native who managed the magic booth at Paramount Canada's Wonderland for 14 years, confesses there is a paradox in his line of work.

"Selling magic is odd because you have to create trust by tricking people. And we don't tell you how something works unless you buy it."

EL AL CANADA HOPING TO WOO MORE JEWISH TRAVELLERS TO ISRAEL

Despite the unstable political situation in the Middle East and the turbulence in the travel business resulting from 9/11 and SARS, El Al Canada is doing reasonably well this summer, says Stanley Morais, the airline's first Canadian-born general manager for Canada.

Part of the reason is the continued popularity of El Al's lucrative Los Angeles-Toronto connection. As well, an astonishingly high proportion of Israelis are world travellers who help fill the airline's four weekly return flights between Toronto and Tel Aviv.

"Our flights this summer are extremely busy, both to and from Israel," Morais said during a talk last week at Toronto's Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue.

Stanley Morais

However, the picture is far from rosy, he acknowledged. In the midst of a shift towards privatization, El Al has been grappling with the same tourism downturns that have caused such industry goliaths as Air Canada to totter on the brink of insolvency.

For the last several years, Air Canada's competing service to Tel Aviv has proven popular. Morais said El Al reacted to Air Canada's challenge by improving its service. For example, the airline now uses more comfortable wide-bodied aircraft on the Canada-Israel run. (Now in its 20th year of operations in Toronto, El Al has entered a codesharing arrangement with Air Canada, enabling it to accept bookings to Israel departing any day in the week.)

In addition to offering improved cabin service, El Al's security standards remain the best in the world, Morais said. "Half the staff we employ here in Toronto are security personnel. It's not something any other airline can boast."

Morais, who formerly worked as an ad executive and media relations officer for the Israel Government Tourist Office in Toronto, said the airline is making a special marketing push towards Canada's 375,000-strong Jewish community.

"The statistic is that only 20 per cent of the Jewish community have visited Israel. I think that's sad," he said. "The question is: why have Jews taken Israel off their list of places to visit?" But he noted that 80 per cent of those Canadian Jews who do visit Israel make return trips.

Morais urged his listeners to visit Israel and to fly El Al. "Be an advocate for travel to Israel because the Israelis need to see us in Israel."

The audience included numerous travel professionals, such as Mindy Green of Intertours, David Freudmann of Uniword Travel, and Tom Moos, formerly of Kennedy Travel.

Travel Guide Update: As previously noted in this column, I consider Footprint's Israel travel guide to be superior to Lonely Planet's or any other competing guidebook because of its high level of detail. The British-based publisher evidently sees its market as intelligent travellers of all budgets who seek social, cultural and historical information that is in-depth yet succinct.

Footprint's European guides, I've found, offer the same exemplary quality and format, along with plenty of town maps and sidebars. Northern Spain, for example, which covers the provinces north of Madrid, provides an insightful sidebar on bullfighting, which it describes as "an emblem of Spanish culture, a reminder of Roman times when gladiators fought wild beasts in amphitheatres."

Likewise, Footprint's Paris city guide offers a delightful summation of the French capital's multiple attractions, and has the additional advantage of being pocket-sized.

Footprint also recently started publishing books about our own country, including a pocket-sized Vancouver city guide. Its regular-format Western Canada guide covers British Columbia, Alberta and the Yukon.

"Take an area bigger than Mexico and sprinkle with fewer people than there are in Switzerland, tucking almost all of them into one small corner," it begins. "Now cover the vast remaining wilderness with row upon row of lofty ice-capped mountains, huge lakes and mighty rivers."

Another publisher of note is Quebec-based Ulysses, whose guides to Montreal, Quebec City and "la belle province" itself have proven vastly popular. The 23-year-old company operates three stores in Montreal and publishes some 90 titles in English and 100 in French. (It also markets the Footprint guides in Canada.)

Long a contented user of its Montreal guide, I'm pleased to see that Ulysses offers an expanded line of Canadian titles. Cycling in Ontario, for instance, is a handy 308-page guide to 37 bicycle tours of varying levels of difficulty, with many maps and descriptions of attractions and off-road trails.

Its 720-page Canada guide seems a very good introduction for tourists. Other Canadian titles include Quebec and Ontario with VIA Rail, Inns and Bed and Breakfasts in Quebec, The Trans-Canada Trail in Newfoundland, Hiking in Ontario, Ottawa-Hull, Atlantic Canada, and numerous guides to Western Canada.

The books reportedly sell well in the United States and Europe as well as in Canada. The publisher's Web site is www.ulyssesguides.com.

Eye on Arts

SUMMER LITERARY COLUMN, PART I: A MODERN JEWISH PICARESQUE HERO

Quick: can you name two prominent authors who made stunning literary debuts while still in their early 20s, each with an effervescent and picaresque first novel that contains a set of smaller stories within the novelistic framework?

Hint: one is a contemporary Jewish-American, the other a British Victorian.

Hailed by the New York-based Forward newspaper as one of this century's greatest novels so far, Jonathan Safran Foer's Everything Is Illuminated is really two books in one.

The tale focuses on a journey by the author's eponymous hero, Jonathan Safran Foer, to his ancestral shtetl of Trachimbrod, Ukraine, in search of the woman who saved his grandfather from the Nazis.

His guide is Alex Perchov, a young Ukrainian translator who narrates key sections of the story in his uniquely fractured English, complemented to great comic effect by his eccentric use of a thesaurus. Their driver is Alex's misanthropic grandfather, who insists that he is blind and brings along his obnoxious seeing-eye dog, Sammy Davis Junior Junior.

As narrated by Alex, the quartet's comic misadventures are by far the best sections of the book. Foer's illuminating portrait of the American Jew returning to the impoverished farmlands of eastern Europe in search of his roots is a brilliant delineation of the modern American Jewish mythical quest. The book deserves a hallowed niche in the annals of Jewish-American literature for this superb satire alone.

Foer's fictional alter-ego presents an absurd family history in alternating chapters. These sections contain quasi-magical but ponderous biographical episodes from the lives of his ancestors, who come across as Tevye-like folksy villagers. Here the writing is redolent of what critic Laura Miller has aptly described as "rehashed Chagall and dime-store Garcia Marquez."

Foer's book-within-the-book is an experimentally daring but ultimately tedious counterweight to the utterly luminous Alex chapters, which have inspired countless critical raves ever since its early appearance in the New Yorker magazine.

Foer, 26, reportedly pounded out a first draft of Everything Is Illuminated very soon after returning from a heritage tour to eastern Europe a few years ago. He has expressed amazement at the critical reception the novel has received and the fact that movie rights have already been sold.

"I'm still surprised I wrote it, I'm surprised it got published and I'm even more surprised that anyone read it," he said last year upon winning the British Guardian fiction prize, worth about $22,000. "I'm not being modest, it's true."

The British Victorian author to whom Foer might be compared? None other than Charles Dickens. England's 19th-century bard was 24 when the first serial instalment of his first novel, Pickwick Papers, came out in 1836. The highly comic picaresque tale, which focuses on the peregrinations of Mr. Pickwick and several of his friends around England, propelled its author to the highest ranks of literary stardom.

Both Foer and Dickens seem to be paying conscious tribute to earlier novelists like Tobias Smollett and Henry Fielding (not to mention Miguel de Cervantes). Foer's stylistic creativity, particularly in the closing sections, is also reminiscent of Laurence Sterne.

With Pickwick, "Dickens' genius was made manifest," according to critic Walter Allen. "Here is Dickens the pure humourist, rejoicing in his ability to dash off character after character, a whole world of them, his and none other's, rejoicing too in the language he puts in their mouths, a language so fertile and exuberant in comic invention as to have a lyrical quality almost of poetry."

Anyone making a similar claim regarding Foer would not be so terribly off the mark.

Dickens followed up his first great success with Oliver Twist, a much darker and sobering look at London's criminal underworld and impoverished streetlife. It is here, perhaps, that the comparison with Foer ends. The exuberantly talented young American is reportedly working on a second novel titled The Zelnick Museum, set in a fictional contemporary museum devoted to the life of a fictional diarist from the 1930s.

Everything Is Illuminated first appeared in 2002. HarperCollins Perennial recently brought out a paperback edition for $21.95.

New or Recently in Print

• Toronto film buff Bill Stern offers his reflections on a diverse assortment of films in You Don't Have to Be Jewish: Commentaries on a Selection of Jewish Content Movies (Lugus).

• Dr. David Nassy, a bankrupt Jewish doctor-planter from Surinam, arrived in Philadelphia in 1792 with his slave, Matthew, just in time for them to help the city through a major epidemic of yellow fever. Ellen Norman Stern tells their story in The French Physician's Boy, a novel recently published by Xlibris.

• New York's Biblio Press presents Voices of Thinking Jewish Women, compiled by Prudence Wright Holmes, a work that highlights 42 Jewish women achievers in many fields – the list includes Sarah Bernhardt, Lillian Hellman, Susan Sontag and Wendy Wasserstein. Biblio has also produced a fresh paper edition of Remarkable Jewish Women: Rebels, Rabbis and Other Women from Biblical Times to the Present, by Emily Taitz and Sondra Henry. 212-989-2755.

Artist explores cycle of life

By ELYSSE ZAREK
CJN Intern

When people first look at Adi Zur's paintings, they're impressed by the colours, but they don't understand the deeper meaning behind them.

The Toronto artist sees her work as much more than colour on canvas. She sees them as representing the cycle of life.

Birth, death and rebirth are the themes she focuses on in her latest works, which will be displayed at the Toronto Outdoor Art Exhibition from July 11 to 13 at Nathan Philips Square.

Zur's encaustic wax paintings are brightly coloured and luminescent, often seeming as if there is a light behind them that illuminates the colours within. The effect is achieved by using alternating layers of hot wax and oil paint.

Double Nature by Adi Zur.

Under the layers of wax and paint are often parts of photographs taken of her family. The result of the buildup of layers is a glowing, yet ambiguous, set of images.

The biggest challenge, Zur says, was to combine the photographs underneath with the paint and wax on top.

"Many times people see the painting and say 'Oh, nice colours,' but then they look at it for a while and they see it," says the Israeli-born Zur.

What she wants viewers to see is the meaning beyond the organic, playful shapes. The fogginess of the paintings, she says, hints at the ambiguity of life.

"We see ambiguity in life because you can never know the enigma of life. You can only see one thing then another."

Even the layers of wax and colour represent more than just wax and colour.

"When I paint, I paint many layers because those are the layers of life," she says.

Zur looks to nature and the past for inspiration. Nature, she says, underscores the themes she explores in her art.

"I love the ocean, I love the water. I always think about what's hiding under the ocean, maybe a boat lost on a journey," she says. "It's like the enigma of life."

She is fascinated by everything that has to do with the past: the Bible, mythology, cave paintings and other hints of prehistoric life.

Her previous set of paintings – mixed media on wooden panels – were influenced by cave drawings like the ones near her childhood home in Israel.

"I lived in an area of Israel where there were lots of ancient caves. I played with my friends in those caves. It made me think there were people just like us living then."

Zur has been painting since she was six years old. She remembers attending art programs after school and painting at home.

Zur majored in philosophy at Tel Aviv University and worked as an art teacher before moving to Canada 12 years ago. In Toronto, she graduated from the Ontario College of Art and Design in 2002 with a diploma in drawing and painting. Now she paints full time. Each painting takes her about a month to complete.

There will be about 25 paintings in her exhibit at the Toronto Outdoor Art Exhibition.

Zur says she likes to plan her paintings so she has an idea of what the outcome will be, but prefers to let her imagination take over when she paints.

"I like it to come from the subconscious. I like not to control it too much, I like the surrealist concept that things should come accidentally," she says. "When you make something from outside, it isn't true. When you make something from inside, it is real."

Montrealer's debut novel captures mood of mid-1970s Israel

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Montreal writer Edeet Ravel readily acknowledges that she based the heroine of her first novel, Ten Thousand Lovers, on herself and her own past as an Israeli-born kibbutznik whose parents brought her to Canada at the age of seven, and who returned to Israel a decade later to attend university in Jerusalem. (She later returned to Montreal, where she taught at a CEGEP college until last year.)

Since Israel is embedded so deeply into her heart and consciousness, it's no surprise her book is set in the Israel she remembers. Although she holds a critical mirror to the country for its treatment of the Palestinians, there's no question of her abiding love and concern for Israel.

The novel takes place in the mid-1970s, which as author Yossi Mellman once observed was a time when "Israelis were all sleepwalking."

Like "The Yellow Wind", David Grossman's famously prescient long essay of the 1980s, Ten Thousand Lovers is set in a pre-intifadah Israel that is smouldering with something dark, foreboding and unnameable.

Essentially a love story, the novel weaves a beguiling spell that is equal parts darkness and light. The plot focuses on the relationship between Lily, the beautiful young first-person narrator, and Ami, a charming Israeli military official whom she meets while hitchhiking.

The story is told by Lily in retrospect, and dark undercurrents become evident almost from her first sentence: "A long time ago, when I was twenty, I had a relationship with a man who was an interrogator."

Ravel says the idea for the book emerged from a conversation she once had with a stranger who admitted being a professional interrogator.

"It never occurred to me that someone could have that job. I was stunned when he told me that. I never knew that that could be a job. It opened up a whole new level of Israeli reality for me."

While the focus never deviates from the wonderfully realized characters and their deepening love affair, the subjects of torture and brutality keep recurring. Ami rejects such repugnant methods and uses only his personal charm to get information from detainees. Still, torture remains an integral part of his workplace and he can't escape the consequences of that, not even after switching careers.

Besides the various biographical details that Ravel shares with the fictional Lily, both she and her heroine share a love for the Hebrew language and the biblical heritage of the Jewish people. Interspersed between the novel's dramatic scenes are many intriguing sidebar discussions of Hebrew words, grammatical points, vulgarisms and Arabic phrases that have infiltrated the language.

"It's very interesting to see how many hundreds of words, not just slang, come into the Hebrew language from Arabic. To me, that's a hopeful sign. It shows that the two cultures are really connected."

Ravel explains that much of the prose came from journals she has kept over many years, adding she modeled Ami in part after her former husband, an Israeli, and used their real-life wedding as the basis for its fictional counterpart.

"But I didn't marry an interrogator. I married a pianist who was never in the army. He never even did basic training."

Published earlier this year in England and Canada, Ten Thousand Lovers has already surpassed the bestseller mark in Canada, and Indigo and Chapters bookstores are prominently displaying it as one of "Heather's Picks," recommended by CEO Heather Reisman.

Republication rights have been sold in six languages and Harper is slated to produce a paperback edition for the U.S. market in September. Ravel has already delivered the manuscript for a second novel to both Random House Canada and Harper in the United States.

"I've written a lot over the years, but I never made a serious effort to get published," she said, recalling that she sent out inquiry letters for Ten Thousand Lovers without the usual representation of a literary agent.

"Even this was not a serious effort. It was a miracle that it got published."

Café features an evening of Yiddish music

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

Lullabies cover a range of moods, from happiness to sadness, with the sad songs reflecting the fears, anxieties and tragedies experienced by the song's lyricist, often a woman.

A program presented recently by Yiddishland Café, Our Mothers Sing: Songs from Various Cultures, featured lullabies that ranged in mood from light to dark. Performed by soprano Denise Williams and tenor Michael Mandel, with accompanists pianist Nina Shapilsky and violinist Rodion Boshoer, each song was like a shimmering jewel.

Along with a selection of Yiddish songs, the evening's program included an Italian and a Hebrew song, sung by Mandel. West Indian and African-American songs, along with four short contemporary works by Canadian composer Beverly Lewis, were performed by Williams.

Williams, who has a voice of crystal clear purity, sang Tsipele, a humorous Yiddish tune about a little girl who wants a kiss. Mandel captivated the audience with a searing version of the classic Rozhinkes mit Mandlen (Raisins and Almonds) from the Lodz ghetto.

The song was one of three different versions of Rozhinkes mit Mandlen performed during the evening. Poet Y. Spiegel wrote the lyrics for the Lodz version of the song after his daughter was murdered. Such sad songs were banned by the head of the Lodz ghetto, Café organizer Henia Reinhartz said, but "they were sung anyway."

Reinhartz and her husband, Nochem, got Yiddishland Café off the ground seven years ago with a $5,000 grant from the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. Aiming to promote the Yiddish language and its literature, the Café presents a reading and four concerts each season.

Last year, a performance of The Megilla of Itsik Manger, in Yiddish and English, attracted so many people that some had to be turned away.

Reinhartz, a former Yiddish teacher, and her husband select the material to be performed at each event. If necessary, the Reinhartzes give their performers literal translations of each song, along with coaching them in pronunciation.

"As long as the Yiddish is correct," she says, the performers "have the music and within that they can do what they feel they want to do."

Denise Williams, a performer at Yiddishland Café from its beginning, understands the Reinhartzes' concern with correct Yiddish pronunciation. "They want to hear their language and hear it right," she says. "They take the preservation of the Yiddish language quite seriously."

A classically trained singer, the Antiguan-born Williams came to Yiddish and Hebrew music through the Showboat controversy of nearly a decade ago. After taking part in a Black and Jewish dialogue during the heat of the controversy – the show was deemed racist by some – she joned and became a soloist with the Toronto Jewish Folk Choir.

Michael Mandel, who is also a regular performer at Yiddishland Café, says that for him the joy of singing Yiddish songs, which the 55-year-old has been doing since he made his debut at seven, deepens his own understanding of what it is to be Jewish.

Mandel's father, Max, was a singer and was well-known in Toronto during the 1930s, '40s and early '50s as the host of various versions of the radio show the "Jewish Hour."

Hamilton Fringe features award-winning play

By PHYLLIS SHRAGGE
Special to The CJN

HAMILTON — This Night, an intense play dealing with the conflict between two brothers struggling to understand their late father's experience in a concentration camp, played at the Hamilton Fringe Festival recently.

The play takes place in the Hellman home over a single night. After 10 years as an unsuccessful political and union activist, David Hellman comes home in defeat and humiliation. His older brother Benny, a successful entrepreneur, is David's sole link to the past. When the spirit of their dead father rises between them, Benny and David battle over the truth of his life.

They cannot even agree on the facts, and the audience is given different enactments of the past. The Hellmans' common Jewish heritage becomes the focus of a struggle for meaning. Which brother has been true to their father's experience as a survivor of the Holocaust? Which has betrayed the legacy?

Written by Canadian author and playwright Robert Majzels, the son of Holocaust survivors, the 90-minute two-act play is an engrossing tale of two men saddled with a memory they cannot entirely call their own.

"This Night is not just about the dilemma of Jewish children of the Holocaust. We are all survivors of the Holocaust. What happened to the 20th century, the failure of western civilization, is a legacy we have to contend with," Majzels said.

Majzels is a novelist and Governor General's Award-winning translator, as well as a playwright and teacher of creative writing at Concordia University in Montreal. His published novels include Hellman's Scrapbook and City of Forgetting. His third novel, Apikoros Sleuth, is slated for release this year.

This Night won first prize at both the 1991 Dorothy Silver Awards in Cleveland, Ohio, and the 1994 Canadian Jewish Playwriting Competition.

The play is directed and designed by Ari Weisberg, founder and artistic director of TEATRON, a production company whose mandate is "to produce Jewish-themed plays from the world's communities."

SARS affects attendance at Jewish library convention

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Attendance was significantly reduced because of the local SARS situation, but many delegates who came to Toronto from across North America to attend the recent Association of Jewish Libraries convention spoke highly of the program.

"We had anticipated a turn-out of about 250 people, but we ended up with 147 full- and part-time registrants," said convention co-chair Gloria Jacobs.

"The purpose of the convention is educational, information sharing, professional development, networking and socializing," she said. "We're completely volunteer driven, so it gave many of our committee members a chance to meet face to face."

A sampling of local writers, poets and artists spoke to delegates of the four-day conference, which was hosted by the Association's Ontario chapter at the Four Seasons Hotel on Yorkville Avenue.

Simcha Simchovitch, Ken Sherman and Adam Sol gave poetry readings and brief talks; author-illustrators James Sturm, Richard Unger and Lesley Simpson discussed various creative aspects of their art; author Cary Fagan spoke about his search for "authentic Jewish stories"; and authors Paul Brown and Vivian Kaplan spoke about and read from their respective books, Shayna's Shadows and Ten Green Bottles. Poet Shula Robin also gave a reading.

Although geared to Jewish librarians, many of the talks could have drawn the interest of a much wider sections of the community. Mark Aaron Polger, a librarian at the University of Waterloo, offered a content analysis of Holocaust denial Web sites, while American author Henry Gonshak spoke about the interrelationship of neo-Nazism and American popular culture.

Steven Bergson, a librarian at the Albert and Temmy Latner Jewish Public Library in Toronto, spoke on Holocaust comics and graphic novels; Rabbi Moshe Shulman of Toronto spoke about using biblical maps in teaching Biblical studies; author Yehuda Lipsitz spoke on how to self-publish a book; and the Latner Library's director, Rabbi Irwin Witty, discussed the relative purity of biblical translations. Other speakers addressed topics as diverse as Jewish children's literature, the digital library, Jewish women in Canada and Jews in Muslim lands.

At its annual awards banquet, the association gave the 2002 Sydney Taylor Award to Toronto author and CBC producer Karen Levine for her book Hana's Suitcase (Second Story Press, Toronto), only a week after the book netted Levine a Canadian Jewish Book prize in children's literature. Other awards went to various American authors.

The association staged several joint sessions with the American Library Association and the Canadian Library Association, whose annual conference opened here last Friday.

Roger Neilson remembered for his love of Israel

By ELI RUBENSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Last week Canadian newspapers were filled with testimonials to Roger Neilson. The celebrated hockey coach passed away at age 69 after heroically battling cancer for more than three years.

Few people were aware of another side to Neilson. He loved Israel and Israelis, and he expressed that love with a passion most Jews would do well to emulate.

In 1997, with the help of Marshall Starkman, Jeff Budd, Rachel Lasry and many others, the first Roger Neilson Hockey Camp in Israel was launched at Canada Centre in Metulla, a town on Israel's northern border.

Supervised by Neilson, as well as a number of other NHL players and staff, the camp ran from 1997 to 2000 and was attended by an estimated 400 Canadian and Israeli youth.

The camp was sponsored by UIA Federations Canada, Canada Israel Experience and Roots Canada and supported by other generous organizations and individuals.

But no one was more important to the success of the camp than Neilson.

"Roger always had a love for Israel," commented long time friend and camp volunteer Paul Bedford. "He was a great history buff and admired the perseverance of Israel, who were the underdogs in his view."

Neilson's love of Israel also translated into love for the Israeli teens he coached.

"Roger loved the kids," observed Starkman. "He loved their rough and tumble attitude, their work ethic, and he just loved their personalities.

"And the kids loved him too," he continued, "because he was so down to earth, because he wanted to know each and every one of them."

One moment will always remain with Starkman. "When Roger returned to the camp after the first year, the moment the kids heard Roger was in the dressing room they charged off the ice, tossed aside their helmets, sticks and gloves and bounced across the concrete with their skates still on. As soon as they reached Roger they jumped on him and circled him with hugs – and, of course, Roger returned all their hugs."

So taken was Roger by his Israeli charges, he committed to sponsoring two Israelis to attend his hockey camp in Lindsay, Ont., every summer.

Lasry and I visited the Israelis one summer at Neilson's home on the shores of Chemong Lake in Peterborough, Ont.. The first thing we noticed was the constant stream of young people coming in and out of the house.

"Roger's doors were never locked – they were always open to guests, and there were always extra bathing suits for those who wanted to swim," remembered Starkman. "His enjoyment came from knowing that others were enjoying his home. He only worried about one thing: how many kids were staying for dinner."

Inside Neilson's home, Rachel and I noticed a photo of the former president of Israel shaking hands with him in Metulla. Ezer Weizman was visiting Metulla after yet another round of Katyusha rockets launched from Lebanon had landed on Israel's northern towns. Neilson came out to greet the president looking like a kibbutznik – barefoot and wearing his customary shorts and baseball hat. The president remarked that Neilson was already half Israeli.

Lasry, the Canadian staff person for three of the camp's four year's in existence, recalled Neilson's dedication to the program.

"It was an honour for the Canadian Jewish community to have had someone of Neilson's stature devote himself to the youth of Israel," she noted. "I don't know many people, Jewish or otherwise, who would volunteer to return to Israel every summer and devote their passion to Israeli youth.

"Roger really changed people through the sport. He knew the passion, the self confidence and the hard work on the ice would also help the young people off the ice. And his influence continued outside the arena, during their hikes in Israel and in handling any discipline issues on the trip," Lasry added.

On one of those hikes, Neilson even expressed a sense of humour about his battle with cancer, recalls Lisi Tesher, a staff person on the 2000 program.

"We were hiking up Masada and the guide told the [shirtless] guys to watch their backs. He said, 'You could get cancer. Be careful!' And Roger replied: 'I already have cancer. I've got nothing to worry about!'" Tesher said.

"I was driving in my car the other day," said Jeff Budd, one of the camp's co-founders. "And I started thinking… I come from a small town, Kitchener, Ont., and yet I had the honour and privilege to work with Roger, to sit on the same bench with him, to watch him work his magic with the Israeli kids. And I started remembering all these stories about my time with Roger and then I just broke down and cried for a long time.

"I am so sorry he is gone."

So are we all.

(Eli Rubenstein, an employee of UIA Federations Canada, worked with Roger Neilson at his hockey camp in Israel from 1997- 2000.)

School teams enjoy championship seasons

By NEIL BECKER
Special to The CJN

Two of the best-kept secrets in school sports have to be the Netivot HaTorah Panthers and the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto Tigers.

The Panthers managed to go undefeated this year, racking up a 12-0 regular season record and going on to win the Day School Junior High Girls Basketball League title. The Tigers, meanwhile, emerged as champions of the TDCAA high school baseball league, a circuit that includes mostly Roman Catholic schools.

"We had great chemistry and excelled throughout the season at rebounding and scoring," said Panthers team manager Alan Steinfeld.

"There are a lot of excellent teams, and finishing undefeated was a definitely a bonus."

During the season, the Panthers experienced some close calls, including one against their neighbours and biggest rival, Leo Baeck, whom they defeated by a single point.

After barely breaking a sweat in beating the Bialik Blizzards 37-20 in the semis, the Panthers had to scratch and crawl before defeating the Associated Hurricanes 35-31 in the league final.

Steinfeld singled out two players for their performance, especially their play in the latter half of the championship game: Grade 8 student Yael Klein and rookie Elana Levine.

"We were trailing until the third quarter before battling back and taking the lead," says Steinfeld of the final game against Associated. "It was a combination of coaching and strong chemistry that really paid off and led us to victory."

Meanwhile, the CHAT Tigers enjoyed a stellar baseball season, capping a 4-2 regular season with a strong playoff run. In the first round quarter finals, they defeated Monsignor Percy Johnson 11-3 and then went on to beat Mary Ward 10-4 in the semis. The Tigers were tested in the final game, which included seven runs scored in the seventh and final inning, but scratched out a 9-8 victory over Michael Power.

"We were tied 8-8 going into the seventh and Jesse Glowinsky drilled the ball over the right fielder's head for a triple in what turned out to be the winning run," said Rob Fishbaum, one of CHAT's coaches.

The final was a real dogfight, as CHAT went up 3-0 in the first inning and at one point held a 5-2 lead. It looked like they were home and cooled out but Michael Power tied things up at 8-8 in the seventh. That's when Glowinsky, known for his big bat, played the hero.
